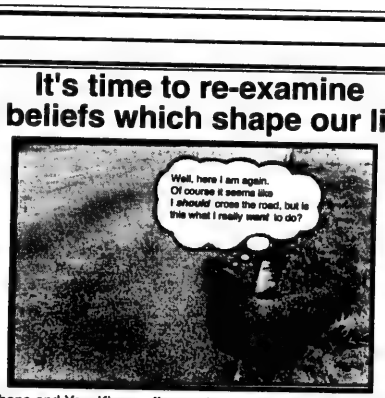
It's time to re-examine the beliefs which shape our lives.



Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur offer a unique opportunity for spiritual change. Dr. Elliott Malamet, Professor of English Literature and renowned Jewish educator, will examine the prayers, historical background and symbols of the High Holidays, to show how these days focus on the meaning of life.

This two part seminar will be like no other you will ever attend!

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

I write this article on the second day of Rosh Chodesh Elul, the day we begin blowing the shofar in preparation for the High Holy Days; and two days after we read on Shabbat the sidrah Re'eh which begins with the verse, "See, I am giving before you today brachah (blessing) and kellalah (curse)."

In a similar verse (Deuteronomy 30:19), where HaShem says that He has given us life and death He adds the words, "Uvocharta bachayim — choose life!"

It's amazing how quickly the year, or should I say, the years, march relentlessly on. I can still remember, what seems like just a few weeks ago, brushing the snow off my windshield, complaining about having to put up with the inconveniences that winter often brings.

At that point I couldn't wait for summer to come — a respite from my duties at school, a few weeks to relax, a change of scenery, a change from the hectic pace of life — and in the twinkling of an eye — the blasts of the shofar, HaShem's alarm clock, rouses us once again from the slumber of the year, awakening us, stirring us to prepare for another din v'cheshbon (Heavenly reckoning and stock taking of our deeds).

When Rabbi Shneur Zalman of Liadi (one of the rebbes of the Lubavitch dynasty) was imprisoned in St. Petersburg, the minister of police came to cross-examine him. The rabbi had an awe inspiring bearing and the minister realized that he was dealing with a very spiritual man.

The minister, a highly educated man, told the rabbi that he wished to ask him a question on the Bible, that had been bothering him for a long time. "Tell me Rabbi, the Bible says God called to Adam and asked, 'Where are you?' Didn't the Almighty know Adam's whereabouts? Is anything hidden from Him?"

The rabbi replied that the Bible is eternal and has a message for all generations. In every age, every year, God calls out to man and asks, "Where are you? Where do you stand as far as the mission of your life is concerned? You have lived a certain amount of years; another year has passed. What have you accomplished? You only have a certain amount of years and days allotted to you. How are you using the years, the days? What progress did you make during the last year in bettering yourself and in bettering the world for mankind?"

Last year after the intensive Elul period followed by Rosh Hashanah, and the Days of Repentance culminating with Yom Kippur, we all made our resolutions. Some may have taken the advice of the baalei mussar — the moralists, and even written down their resolutions in a little notebook.

We resolved to be better between man and God, between man and fellow man, and even between man and himself. We resolved to study more Torah, be more punctilious in our mitzvah observance, give more tzedakah, do more kind deeds.

Well, where are you? How did you do? How much new territory did you capture from the evil inclination?

They tell the story of a Shlomo Moskowitz who hadn't missed a minyan in 20 years, attended every shiur and Torah lecture given at shul, and was careful in his observance of all the mitzvot. He was a very devout and pious individual. Shlomo was getting older, near retirement age, and one bright day the yetzer hora (the evil inclination) was determined to make a chink in the armour of his piety.

"Come on Shlomo, you've been good for so long, the sisterhood is arranging a three-day junket to Las Vegas. What's three days off when you've been such a tzaddikel for over 20 years?"

It was a bright sunny day. Everybody was excited, looking forward to their Las Vegas excursion. Shlomo was all dressed down for the occasion — bermuda shorts, flowered shirt, dark sun glasses, and a rakish hat comfortably perched on his head. The plane landed and Shlomo retrieved his luggage. Then he hailed a taxi and, just as he was about to get in, he tripped on the curb, fell heavily to the sidewalk, breaking an arm and a leg, and fracturing a few ribs.

Flat on his back in the hospital, Shlomo tearfully lifted his eyes heavenward and cried out, "Dear God, 20 years! I never missed a minyan, did everything right by the holy book! Twenty years! What's a three-day fling in Las Vegas? You didn't even give me a chance to get started!"

A heavenly voice rang out, "Shloimele, is that really you? My gosh, I'm sorry, I didn't recognize you!"

When we stand again preparing our case for a new year of life, good health, happiness, nachas from the children, parnassah (livelihood) and all the other items on our long shopping list for the coming year, the first thing we must ask ourselves is if God will recognize us. Each of us left last Yom Kippur with resolve to turn over a new leaf, change into a different and better person; we created a new image and picture of who we are.

And now as we stand in line again awaiting HaShem's blessings, the question will be, did we live up to that image, that picture? Can God trust us to keep our promises and resolve as we ask for our New Year's list of blessings?

But no matter what, we must never ever give up. HaShem presents us each and every year, each and every day, with the opportunity to choose between blessing and the opposite. Certainly, once a particular path has been chosen it may be a little harder to back track — to go back to the crossroad and start the path of life afresh. But we can do it. That's what teshuvah (repentance) is all about — and we choose life all over again.

Let the shofar sounds heard each Elul morning stir us once again to begin our preparations for new resolves. In this way we shall enter the High Holy Days with our defence attorneys well equipped to plead our cases before the Heavenly throne for a new year filled with all the blessings that each of us pray for. May we all, so be blessed! Amein.

Rabbinical council backs D.C. pact

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Israel's highest religious body gave its formal approval this week to the July 28 Washington Declaration, which officially brought to an end the 46-year state of war between Israel and Jordan.

But while approving the agreement last week, the Chief Rabbinical Council requested that it take part in any future discussions on the status of the Muslim holy sites in Jerusalem.

The council, which includes both Ashkenazi and Sephardi religious leaders, made the request as a result of a provision in the declaration in which Israel recognized Jordan's traditional role as guardian of the religious sites, which include the el-Aksa and Omar Mosques.

In a statement issued after its meeting, the council said that the historic right of the Jewish people to the Temple Mount was not open to dispute.

Israel's recognition of Jordan's role at the holy sites has been the subject of much criticism from the Palestinian leadership, which hopes to establish eastern Jerusalem as the capital of an eventual Palestinian state.

The mixed blessings of the Israel-Jordan gamble

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

On the face of it, the emotional impact of the rapprochement with Jordan was almost as strong as that of President Anwar al-Sadat's visit in 1977.

Its practical significance, however, is more difficult to measure. Although the "state of war" between Jordan and Israel was formally ended and celebrated, and from now on contacts between the two countries will be open and not denied as they were for decades, full normalization will have to wait.

Not only are the outstanding issues between Jordan and Israel, such as the demarcation of frontiers, the distribution of water resources, and the fate of the Palestinians displaced by the 1967 war, still unresolved; they will require complicated negotiations.

And even if all this is settled, nobody expects King Hussein to sign a separate, final peace treaty.

As the practical coexistence with Israel was quite satisfactory, one can ask what induced the King to make his spectacular move and why the United States and Israel joined in promoting an initiative, the impact of which on the overall peace process is at best unpredictable, and which nonetheless endangers the King's political and even physical survival in the inflamed Islamic environment.

As far as Jordan is concerned, the explanation is not so complicated. The King's unfortunate entanglement with Iraq during the Gulf War and after has denied him the vital Saudi aid and has shut the doors and coffers of Washington as well. His kingdom was flooded by an additional 200,000 Palestinian refugees chased from Kuwait and his economy had become literally unmanageable.

Only Washington could provide temporary relief, by promising to cancel his huge debts and by offering some military supplies. He had to reciprocate by engaging in the latest open moves with Israel. That he did with remarkable royal grace and charm. As to the personal dangers to which he evidently exposed himself, these were largely tempered by the common knowledge that the superb spectacle barely covered the rather modest substance.

Yeshayahu Anug

Still, it was an excellent, even moving show and shows are important time-fillers in politics, when substantial progress on other issues is denied to struggling politicians. This may also be the simplest explanation for the American role in this unusual episode. Nobody can blame them for sharing the limelight or for paying the costs.

But what was in it for the Israeli government? For a while it enhanced the nation's optimism, showed its deep yearning for peace and left the Likud opposition no choice but to massively support the agreement with Jordan in the Knesset. No small achievement — internal politics count for a lot — but hardly a lasting one.

In fact, soon after the celebrations were over, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had to meet with Yasser Arafat to allay his fears that the accord with Jordan would affect Israel's commitments to the PLO.

Arafat has his own survival problems. His administration in Gaza and Jericho lacks both funding and organizational skill, and the support of the frustrated population depends greatly on the authority he commands. His clout was certainly affected, whether the suspicion of a Jordanian-Israel collusion are well-founded or not. They probably are not, since whoever in Israel still thinks that Arafat should be outmanouevred, ought to know that the alternative to Arafat in the territories is at this point not the Jordanian King, but fundamentalist Islam.

As the Israeli government should not be suspected of being unrealistic, it follows that it will now have to intensify its cooperation with Arafat, to keep him afloat and to maintain the momentum of the Israel-Palestinian agenda.

Not less complex is the state of Israeli-Syrian relations after the Jordanian episode. On the one hand President Hafez al-Assad has made no hostile public comment on the Israeli-Jordanian embrace and has even allowed his media to fully cover all the spectacular events as they happened. Was this unprecedented coverage an indication of Assad's intention to slowly de-demonize Israel in the eyes of his own masses?

Possibly, but then, how can one explain his seemingly undiminished tolerance of Hezbollah terrorist activity in Lebanaon and beyond? This is a legitimate question, but the latest flare-up there requires a less incriminatory answer.

On a routine air-attack against Hezbollah positions, an "intelligent" Israeli bomb missed the intended terrorist target and destroyed a civilian building instead, killing its seven civilians.

Though Israel recognized the mistake and even grounded the pilot, one could not expect Hezbollah not to use the incident for retaliation, or not to regard it as a breach of the bizarre "modus vivendi" which tacitly stipulates that Hezbollah does not direct Katyusha rockets at Northern Galilee and that Israel does not attack villages outside the security zone.

And then there is the very sensitive issue of the Golan Heights. An acute observer of that sector said recently that the war over the Golan is not waged by Syria in the Golan itself, but by its handling of Hezbollah in Southern Lebanon.

Yet the accusation that Israel is doing the same, is unfounded. No sane Israeli planner can hope to affect Syria's determination to regain the Golan, by harassing it in Lebanon. It is clear that the precarious situation which Israel still faces in Southern Lebanon will only be resolved by a peace accord with Syria, which is still not in sight. Assad can wait and is playing his cards prudently.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher's latest visit to Syria was not successful, but he is to return to Damascus and Jerusalem for a more energetic attempt to bridge the gap. If he does better than last time, this will re-ignite the now more peaceful internal debate in Israel.

It is not surprising that the much televised embrace between Israel and Jordan should have revived the old suspicion in the Arab world that Israel is counting on the lack of inter-Arab solidarity and that it aims to expose its notorious weakness. But the past has shown that Israel is not that good in such enterprises. The unfortunate Lebanese war of 1982 proves the point. Its open ends are still bleeding pointlessly in both countries.

Summing up: Even after the well-staged Jordanian-Israeli episode, the overall chances for Mideastern peacemaking to succeed remain basically unchanged. The centrepiece is still the Israeli-Palestinian sector which must be carefully nursed, and Syria still holds the master key to a comprehensive solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Progress must be made on all these fronts if the whole construction is not to collapse.

Wait-and-see attitude in Ukraine, Belarus

By LISA GLAZER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

As the newly elected presidents of the Ukraine and Belarus switch from the hyperbole of the campaign trail to the harsh realities of elected office, Jewish community leaders are expressing a wait-and-see attitude toward their new government chiefs.

The leaders are hoping for a continuation of the recent trend toward open and friendly relations between the government and the Jewish communities in both countries.

However, since Jewish topics did not play a role in either campaign, they say the new presidents' actions will have to be closely scrutinized.

Ukraine's new president, Leonid Kuchma, a former director of the world's largest nuclear-missile factory, was inaugurated last month. Alexander Lukashenko, a fiery populist with little political track record, took office in July as the president of Belarus.

In Ukraine, Chief Rabbi Ya'akov Bleich said that under the leadership of the newly independent state's first president, Leonid Kravchuk, official anti-Semitism virtually disappeared.

After decades of repression during the Soviet era, Ukrainian Jews are now free to become involved in religious or cultural life or to emigrate to Israel.

In Ukraine, the Jewish community of about half a million is currently home to more than 50 Jewish congregations and nearly 20 Jewish schools.

"Kravchuk had a very positive relationship with the Jews, and we hope this will continue with Kuchma," Rabbi Bleich said.

He noted that one member of Kuchma's campaign staff visited him a day after the July 10 election to hear about Jewish concerns and to invite him to join the Humanitarian Alliance, a non-governmental organization that will be advising the new president on health, education, welfare and religious policy.

Rabbi Bleich also said the Jewish community has been invited to send a representative to the commission revising the laws on religion.

Experts in Moscow said that the general issues propelling the Ukrainian presidential campaign — the failing economy and relations with Russia — could have an impact on the Jewish community.

Kuchma's moderate, pro-market approach is helpful for the Jewish community, they said, as are renewed connections with Russia, which Kuchma has supported.

Many Ukrainian Jews speak Russian and not Ukrainian.

"None of the candidates running in the elections spoke about Jews and Jewish problems, but we think Kuchma will implement tolerant policies," said Leonid Feinberg, director of a social science research center run by the Ukraine's Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities.

The situation in Belarus is less clear — and potentially less rosy for the small Jewish community of about 150,000.

The newly independent state of 10 million has been labelled "the land that time forgot" because much of life remains as it was during the period of Soviet domination. Economic reforms are proceeding slowly, and a Lenin statue still stands in the capital's central square.

Meanwhile, Belarus is in the midst of a huge economic crisis as inflation gallops along at about 50 per cent a month.

Economic woes are frequently cited as the reason that Lukashenko, 39, won more than 80 per cent of the July 10 vote, beating Conservative Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich, 59, to become the first elected president of Belarus.

A former collective farm boss who came into the spotlight with an anti-corruption campaign, Lukashenko has promised to halt the republic's fledgling privatization program.

Lukashenko has been compared to Russian ultra-nationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky because of his populist style and his promises of resolute action against his enemies.

But Jewish leaders say that so far the comparison is unfair.

"He is a populist, but of no specific color; an unknown personality who rode the wave of discontent to get into power," said Binyamin Meltzer, the vice president of the Association of Jewish Communities in Belarus.

"By no means can he be called a Zhirinovsky," added Yitzchok Wolpin, the chief rabbi of Belarus. "But his positions are very unclear. He's been making statements left and right. We really don't know who we're dealing with."

Rabbi Wolpin said that under Kebich's rule, the Jewish community has been able to begin rebuilding after suffering near-devastation during Soviet times.

There are now 14 congregation in Belarus, all but two of them established in the last few years.

Rabbi Wolpin said he had a very good relationship with the prime minister and several ministers in the cabinet, but that so far, he has not been sought out by the president-elect's staff.

One should be careful in judging Poland

By WAYNE BELICK

There is a tendency to stratify prejudice according to countries and religious groups. Germany has, at least in this century, been considered the most anti-Semitic of all countries. There is also a common belief, especially among the Jewish people, that Poland is probably the second most anti-Semitic country, with Canada near the bottom.

But classification has a negative aspect. Continual reproach can often lead to more hatred against the targeted group. My own Jewish kind may even be responsible for promulgating some anti-Semitism. This was revealed to me when I went to teach English in Poland this year.

Prior to my arrival in Warsaw, I knew very little about the country or its inhabitants except for the few stories I heard from Polish friends in Toronto. My father's response to my decision to go there was, "Why Poland? Don't you know they are anti-Semitic?"

I started to become ill at ease. I feared I had made a serious mistake in my commitment to work with the ETTP (Education And Training Programs For Poland). I was almost ready to drop out. Instead, I decided to find out for myself just how anti-Semitic Poland really was.

The drive to dispel the myth about anti-Semitism grew steadily within me, and I looked for the existence of it in every crevice of Poland. I began by speaking about it with my students, openly admitting that I was a Jew. I found one honest case of anti-Semitism in a 17-year-old who had never met a Jew. I asked him, "Do you like me?" Michael said he did. When I told him I was Jewish it seemed to confuse him: he obviously had a preconceived notion of what a Jew must look and act like.

Since that time, after having asked Michael to reevaluate his beliefs, he never neglected to say "good morning" with a smile on his face. If I had changed one person's attitude towards the Jewish race, perhaps it could be a start towards curtailing the rest of the prejudice in Poland.

I looked hard everywhere for the next nine months, searching for answers, counting occurrences of both anti-Semites and pro-Semites, weighing them against each other. I saw a lot of graffiti in Warsaw and Gdansk which denoted hatred towards Jews. It seemed clearer to me than to my non-Jewish associates because I was looking for it. But this kind of graffiti also exists in Canada, and has been used more viciously in Jewish cemeteries. Prejudice is everywhere, but how can anybody measure it?

Nearing the end of my stay, I felt I had come to understand everything about the relationship between Jews and Poles. I had spoken with dozens and dozens of people on the subject, including Holocaust survivors at the only synagogue in Warsaw. Their views on the Polish people corresponded to the accounts I had heard back home. The handful of Jewish people here clearly separated themselves and kept a low profile. Still, I wasn't sure if Poland was an anti-Semitic country.

Then in my last few weeks, I experienced the most blatant hatred toward Jews I had ever known, even in my own country, and it came at a time when I was feeling quite comfortable with my Judaism in Poland.

I had gone to see Schindler's List, which opened in Poland just months after its North American run. I cried. I had been to Auschwitz only a month before. I also found it disturbing that the film portrayed the Polish people in an unfavorable light — like the young Polish girl who says "Go away, Jews!"

In a later conversation with a Polish man, he told me he didn't like the Jews because they had said "the Poles were just as responsible for the Holocaust as the Germans." I could not do anything to change his opinion, and the conversation ended after I told him I was Jewish. I know very well that this belief is not a common one in Poland, but it is still a belief which can foster prejudice, given the right opportunity. The question is, where does this belief come from?

For every occurrence of anti-Semitism in Poland I witnessed, I could find at least double the number of Poles who were not hostile towards Jews. I made several friends there, and all of them accepted me and my religious background.

Yes, anti-Semitism in Poland does exist, and it will continue to exist — in Poland and around the world. However, it should not be promoted by equivalent hatred. At one point in history, Poland was one of the leading countries in Europe to admit Jews. And, although governments in Poland in the past have shown resistance to Jews, this should not be used as a guide to measure the beliefs of the entire Polish nation, as people are likely to do.

My excursion to Poland was intriguing. I want very much to return some day. And I hope to continue to strengthen the bond between the Jewish people and the Polish people.

Real peace

Normalization, the key to Israel's incremental rapprochement with Jordan, is continuing apace since King Hussein officially ended his state of war with Israel last month.

A formal peace treaty, such as the one Israel has had with Egypt since 1979, lies on the horizon. But in the meantime, Israel and Jordan are taking well-publicized, concrete steps which herald a new, promising era in their bilateral relations.

On August 3, King Hussein, escorted by Israeli F-15s, flew over Tel Aviv and Jerusalem in his private plane as he made his way home from Washington and London. It was an important moment, a harbinger of the new international air corridors being established between Israel and Jordan.

On August 6, the two countries set up telephone links, and two days later, the first border crossing in the Arava, just north of Eilat and Aqaba, was unveiled and opened to third-party passport holders. On the same day, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his entourage were invited to King Hussein's palace in Aqaba and a ride aboard his royal yacht. At a press conference, King Hussein referred to his Israeli interlocutors as "friends and partners."

These were not empty words and gestures. King Hussein and his brother and heir-apparent, Crown Prince Hassan, appear interested in forging cordial, mutually beneficial ties with Israel. By all accounts, they have rejected the notion of a so-called cold peace, which has all too often characterized Israel's relationship with Egypt.

There are, of course, major problems which must be addressed and solved before Israel and Jordan actually sign a peace treaty. These range from the demarcation of borders to the allocation of scarce water resources. But according to reliable sources, progress has being reported on all fronts. There are even plans afoot to expand east-west highways to link Israel with Jordan.

Peace — a genuine peace that meets the needs of both nations — is not too far around the corner. We await it with anticipation and untrammelled joy.

Iranian menace

"If you like North Korea, you'll love Iran." That's the message conveyed by the co-authors of a recent article in Midstream exploring the current drive in Iran to cultivate nuclear weaponry. The sober message communicated by Louis Beres and Yoash Tsiddon-Chatto is that if left unchallenged, the authorities in Teheran will proceed within a year or two to equip themselves with the bomb.

This disquieting scenario — nuclear weapons in the hands of an outlaw state — has nightmarish implications. Iraq was apparently on its way to becoming a nuclear power in 1991, when progress in this direction was halted by Desert Storm.

Speculation that Iran is well on the way towards achieving nuclearization is based on the fact that the United States and the West in general have already conceded that they have been impotent in stopping the North Koreans in their pursuit of atomic weapons. It is well-known that Pyongyang has been helping Teheran to develop its atomic facilities.

Naturally Iran has denied categorically that it is planning to produce weapons wth its fissionable material. The Iranians say that they are looking only at the peaceful use of atomic energy. Anyone who believes that also believes in the tooth fairy.

Since the advent to power in 1979 of the Ayatollah Khomeini, Iran has become a terrorist state which has persecuted its own people with almost the same zeal it applied to Iraqi invaders during the eight-year-long Iraq-Iran war. The war has been over for several years but Iran continues to conduct warfare against its minority Bahais and anyone else who does not subscribe blindly to the dictates of the mullah-dominated leadership cadres.

Instead of devoting itself to the task of reconstructing its economy, Iran continues to re-arm and export its radicalism through the support of such terrorist groups as the Hezbollah.

In addition, Iran, now under Rafsanjani, continues to vilify Israel as the devil's own experiment station on earth.

It is unfortunate that neither the United States nor any other political group has seen fit to stop Iran's indecent haste to acquire nuclear weapons. There can be no doubt who would be the intended target of Teheran's illogical wrath should it ever have the unwisdom to arm its nuclear arsenal.

The authors of the Midstream article suggest that Israel has no obligation to wait patiently for its own annihilation and that it may invoke the "right of anticipatory self-defence," some time in the near future. This is not a pleasant prospect to contemplate.

It is for this reason that pressure must be brought on democratic governments, especially the United Staters and its NATO allies, to take quick and resolute measures to defuse Iran's maniacal chase after nuclear weapons.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. DIFFERS WITH KIRSHNER

In his review of Iwo Cyprian Pogonowski's book Jews in Poland: A Documentary History, Sheldon Kirshner writes: "As for the Holocaust period, [Pogonowski] claims that there was no Polish complicity in the Nazi genocide of the Jews. Needless to say, he is dead wrong." (CJN, July 21)

Lest your readers think that Pogonowski was merely expressing his personal opinion, it should be pointed out that he cites an impressive body of scholarship, some of it written by prominent Jewish historians, which backs up his statement. One example, will suffice.

Yisrael Gutman, the director of research at the Yad Vashem Institute and editor-in-chief of the authoritative four-volume Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, has stated publicly that "all accusations against the Poles that they were responsible for what is referred to as the 'Final Solution' are not even worth mentioning." And most recently: "I want to be unequivocal about this. When it is said that Poles supposedly took part in the extermination of the Jews on the side of the Germans, that is not true. It has no foundation. There were minor exceptions where the [Polish] 'blue' police and the Jewish police took part in the expulsion and extermination of Jews."

SLOGAN MONGERING?

Part of Sheldon Kirshner's review of three books on Polish-Jewish relations (CJN, July 21) is devoted to a book by I. C. Pogonowski. It contains the following paragraph:

"As for the Holocaust period, he [that is, Pogonowski] claims that there was no Polish complicity in the Nazi genocide of the Jews. Needless to say, he is dead wrong."

The last sentence in this paragraph is a grave indictment. Since it is not accompanied by evidence, this indictment is harmful and dangerous "slogan mongering" and not the kind of level-headed and persuasive journalism that I have come to expect of Mr. Kirshner.

Abe Shenitzer
Emeritus Professor of Mathematics

Toronto

Sheldon Kirshner replies: Let's be clear. The Polish nation is not guilty of complicity in the Final Solution, conceived, planned and implemented by Germany. But, as I wrote in my review and historians support, the Polish Blue Police took part in the Holocaust. Furthermore, untold numbers of Poles betrayed Jews and caused their deaths. And by their silence and mass indifference, all too many Poles dishonored themselves and Poland. Of course, thousands of courageous and decent Poles helped — and saved — Jews at risk to their own lives.

HELL IN TRANSNISTRIA

Yishar-koach to Felicia Carmelly for her praiseworthy initiative to raise the awareness of Transnistria in our community. The letter from Ruth Getter on the same subject (CJN, July 28) is ample proof how necessary and important such awareness is.

I myself endured for 3½ of my childhood years the horrors of Transnistria, and have carried that baggage ever since. The hellhole was a little town in the Ukraine named Djurin. There, among thousands of others, my father and my grandmother perished, while in another Transnistria location, in Bershad, two of my father's brothers and a sister suffered the same fate.

Aside from their murderous brutality, the Romanian soldiers, the rulers of the territory, had the twin scourges of hunger and a typhus epidemic on their side. In the fall of 1941, almost 4,000 of the Jews deported from the Romanian provinces of Bukovina and Bessarabia were dumped onto this small town on the heads of a local population of about 500; by the fall of 1944, when the Red Army liberated the area, less than 1,200 had survived.

It is not difficult to envision the cramping and congestion. In our case, we found ourselves lodged with a local Jewish family (Djurin was a typical Ukrainian Shtetl, 99 per cent Jewish), in a house straight from a Chagall painting, where we shared a 20x20-foot room with three other families. We were 12 people in that small room before raging death left only eight of us. Every one of us, without exception, had contracted typhus (typhus exanthematicus, "spotted fever").

After half a century, now that most of us who were children then are grandparents, the time has come to tell our brethren and the world about the "forgotten cemetery" that was Transnistria. Lest we forget. Lest we allow the offsprings of the beast, the would-be destroyers to deny.

HOW STUDENTS HELPED

Re: "Israeli MiA group joins Network to promote cause" (CJN, July 28)

Despite the article title, The CJN failed to accurately report the full extent of Network's involvement with the International Coalition for missing Israeli Soldiers (ICMIS).

Network has been involved with the MiA campaign for several years. During this past year, Network formed the National Student Coalition for the Israeli MiAs (NSCIM) with the help of Tirza Kramer in Montreal.

In January, Network sent information posters, solidarity bracelets and written literature to campuses across Canada. In partnership with the NSCIM, Network helped to facilitate rallies across Canada on behalf of the MiAs.

On March 8 in Winnipeg, "More than 100 adults and students gathered in front of the building in bonechilling weather as Zentner (hunger striker and rally organizer) and other speakers stood on the stairs, and underscored the importance of getting information about the soldiers." (Winnipeg Jewish Post & News).

The above quote echoes Network's sentiments and involvement with the MiA campaign. Network encourages participation and cooperation between the various interested groups. Network would also like to take this opportunity to applaud the efforts of the dedicated students across Canada. Keep up the good work.

A FOREGONE CONCLUSION

Yasser Arafat has been, since the Declaration of Principles, steadily pronouncing statements contrary to the terms of the agreement of September 13, 1993, without meaningful reaction on the part of the Israeli government.

In the most recent of his utterings on his arrival in Gaza, he vows to build an independent "Palestinian State with Jerusalem its capital."

This prompted Yitzhak Rabin to declare categorically that Jerusalem will remain undivided under Israeli authority. Rabin, however, failed to mention in his rebuking of Arafat, the "Palestinian State." This omission may lead one to construe that the establishment of a "Palestinian State" is, and perhaps has been, a foregone conclusion.

Why Lanzmann didn't like Schindler's List

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

I recently came across a dissident review of Schindler's List written by the eminent film producer Claude Lanzmann. It appeared in the Parisian Newspaper Le Monde.

Lanzmann, you will remember, produced and directed Shoah, the most memorable documentary on the Holocaust, which appeared in 1986; in its full uncut length it covered nine and a half hours of viewing time. There is no question in my mind that this film will forever stand in as the most eloquent witness to a tragedy which in the end could not be captured in words or pictures.

But by its ponderous telling of what could be told, it failed to evoke the kind of instant and all-embracing reactions which Steven Spielberg achieved with Schindler's List. The reasons for the latter's success have been written about time and again (and I confess I contributed to this amplitude).

Not surprisingly, Lanzmann looks askance at Spielberg's production, and I thought it worthwhile to translate excerpts of his critique.

"I generally like Steven Spielberg. I saw Indiana Jones and ET and found that he makes good films.

"When I heard of his latest project (about which I knew nothing) I said to myself, Spielberg will experience a dilemma, for he cannot tell us Schindler's tale without telling us at the same time what the Holocaust was all about. And how can he portray the Holocaust by telling the story of a German who saved 1,200 Jews, while the overwhelming majority of Jews were not saved? Even if he shows Nazi behavior in the Krakow ghetto, even when he shows how the commandant shoots prisoners — he can never do justice to portraying the organized killing and the murderous machinery.

Rabbi Plaut

"The Holocaust is unique in that it is surrounded by a wall of flame, a border that one must not cross, because beyond a certain point there is no measure for atrocities, and whoever tries to trespass into this area is guilty of a serious transgression.

"In that sense all fiction is crossing the uncrossable line. It is my deepest conviction that attempting to picture the Holocaust in this sense is forbidden.

"When I saw Schindler's List I reacted in the same way in which I reacted to the TV series Holocaust: trespassing the uncrossable line and trivialization of the name. Whether TV or film, both trivialize and thus deny the singularity of the Holocaust.

"One can ask still another question: what kind of tale is here being told? It is the tale of the Righteous Gentiles. Suddenly there are increasing numbers of people who saved Jews. But if there were so many righteous people who were so ready to save Jews, why are there so many Jews who died?

"Most of all, what I have against Spielberg is the fact that he portrays the Holocaust through a German. Even if this man saved Jews, it changes the whole scenario entirely. The world is upside down."

"In Shoah much is ruled out, for it is a film about death, it has nothing to do with survival. In Shoah none of the survivors says 'I.' The barber does not tell how after three months he fled from Treblinka. That didn't interest me and neither did it interest him. He says 'We' — he speaks for the dead, he is their spokesperson.

"As for me, I wanted to find a structure, a form which applies to the whole people, contrary to Spielberg, for whom extermination is only the background; he does not expose himself to the blinding, darkened sun of the Holocaust. Do people cry when they see Schindler's List? Maybe. But tears are a catharsis. Many people have said to me: 'I can't see your film because when you see Shoah it is not possible to cry.'

"In a certain sense Spielberg's film is a melodrama, and kitsch to boot. To be sure, it is a cops-and-robbers drama which entices the viewer — but that is all."

I think Lanzmann makes an important point, but is it unfair to say that a sense of sour grapes also pervades his argument?

Wallenberg was poisoned, says former Soviet spy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

What really happened to Raoul Wallenberg? Why did Josef Stalin toy with the idea of a Jewish republic in Crimea? Why were Soviet spies sent to Palestine? Why did the Soviet Union launch an anti-Semitic campaign after World War II?

These and other questions are addressed, if not answered, by Pavel Sudoplatov, the Soviet Union's deputy director of foreign intelligence from 1939 to 1942 and a super spook until his arrest in 1953, following Stalin's death.

Sudoplatov, who lives in Moscow today, deals with a plethora of issues in his revealing memoirs, Special Tasks (Little, Brown, $29.95). But how reliable a witness is the author? Ask Robert Conquest, the noted Sovietologist. "This is the most sensational, the most devastating and in many ways the most informative autobiography ever to emerge from the Stalinist milieu," he writes glowingly in the forward.

Sudoplatov claims that Wallenberg, the savior of Hungarian Jewry, was secretly executed in Moscow's Lubyanka prison in 1947, two years after he was detained in Budapest by the Soviets. His murder, he writes, was the result of "a recruitment effort gone bad."

As he tells it, the Wallenbergs' relationship with the Soviet Union started in 1944, when Moscow began looking for influential figures in Sweden who might act as intermediaries between the Soviet Union and Finland. Stalin was concerned that Finland, a German ally since 1941, might sign a separate peace agreement with the United States and thus imperil Soviet interests in Finland and the Baltics.

Wallenberg, he says, was arrested on the direct orders of Nikolai Bulganin, the deputy defence minister, who had been given to understand that he was in the pay of Western countries. As crazy as it sounds, there had even been speculation that Wallenberg was controlled by Nazi Germany.

After he was arrested, Wallenberg was treated with kid gloves, since the Soviets tried to turn him into a spy. He was interrogated by, among others, a high-ranking Jewish intelligence officer, Col. Dmitri Koppelansky, who was purged from the security service in 1951.

However, when it became clear that Wallenberg would not cooperate, he was poisoned and then cremated.

Sudoplatov claims that Stalin intended to use Jewish aspirations for a homeland to attract international Jewish funds to the war-torn Soviet Union.

In February 1944, the famous Jewish actor, Solomon Mikhoels, a member of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, wrote a letter outlining a proposal for a Jewish republic in Crimea. The letter, Sudoplatov says, is still not declassified.

The concept of a Jewish homeland was discussed at the administrative level of the Soviet government and by Stalin himself, we're told. Indeed, Mikhoels was dispatched on a mission to the United States to whip up interest in the putative plan, which died when Stalin voiced opposition to it.

After the war, Sudoplatov notes, Stalin turned his attention to Palestine. He was convinced that Britain and the United States wanted to settle the Palestine question without the involvement of the Soviet Union, as well as to carve up spheres of Western influence in the Middle East.

By way of strengthening Moscow's influence in the region and penetrating the Zionist movement, Stalin sent three Soviet agents to Palestine in 1946. It isn't clear whether they achieved their objectives, but it transpires that one of the spies arranged for the shipment to Palestine of small arms and anti-tank grenades seized from Germany in Romania.

In passing, Sudoplatov discusses the establishment of the Jewish Autonomous Republic in Birobidzhan in 1928. This ill-starred entity, he emphasizes, was not created as "a favor" to Jews, but as an attempt to reinforce Soviet influence in an area under constant attack by Chinese and White Russian "terrorist groups."

Stalin stimulated his anti-Semitic campaign in the second half of 1946, for at least three reasons. After the onset of the Cold War, Stalin's hopes for obtaining overseas Jewish capital faded. Stalin was fed up with "Jewish demands at home," a reference to the rise of Jewish national and religious consciousness in the Soviet Union. Lastly, Stalin felt snubbed and isolated by British and American moves in Palestine.

Stalin's anti-Semitism culminated in a purge of Jews from the Communist party, diplomatic corps, military and intelligence services (all Jewish colonels and generals in the Ministry of Security were summarily arrested). Sudoplatov's Jewish wife, Emma, a KGB lieutenant colonel, retired in 1949, just before the axe fell on her department.

It goes without saying that the purges bore no relation to the victims' loyalty to the state. Sudoplatov relates that, during World War II, 90 percent of the Soviet Union's spies in Nazi-occupied Europe were Jews. Their reports, he says, "enabled us to beat back the (1941) German invasion." Yet, after the war, "we turned against the Jews who had served us loyally," he writes in a tone of regret.

The post-war purges climaxed with the infamous Doctors' Plot, in which a group of physicians, mostly Jews, were unjustly accused of trying to kill Soviet leaders. Sudoplatov compares this episode to the purges of the 1930s, which Stalin orchestrated to eliminate potential rivals.

Sudoplatov comments that the purges spun out of control, and were exploited by politicians who simply "harbored old hatreds against the Jews." For Stalin himself, anti-Semitism was merely "a tool" to sweep away possible centres of political opposition, Sudoplatov believes. "But in the hands of his subordinates it became a revival of an age-old tradition, pure hatred of Jews."

He adds: "Unfortunately, it was a legacy that remained and flourished after (Stalin's) death. The acceptance within the leadership of anti-Semitic policies finally stripped the government of an entire population of public servants who had supported the (1917) revolution and worked for the establishment of Soviet power. When the country came upon hard times and disintegrated, the flower of this educated leadership and their children had emigrated to Israel and the West."

Lest he be misunderstood, Sudoplatov writes that a privileged class of assimilated Jews — intellectuals and highly qualified professionals — remained untouched by the purges.

Sudoplatov claims that Mikhoels was murdered on Stalin's express orders. Mikhoels, he writes, had attained "the stature of a leader with world recognition," and Stalin feared his growing importance. Mikhoels was jabbed with a poisoned needle and later, in Minsk, thrown under the wheels of a truck to create the impression that he had been killed in a hit-and-run accident.

We're definitely not tied by convention

By JACK CHISVIN

It's not that I don't own a tie. I have a rack of them — diagonal stripes, polka dots, flowers, paisleys and indescribable patterns, all made of the best materials money can buy: Italian silks and handwoven wools. To tell the truth I even hoard several shoe boxes of wide and narrow ones so that when Harry Rosen or whoever the maven is who dictates men's fashions announces that new width ties are in, I'll be ready.

I was traumatized when I entered university. I was a poor kid from a working class neighborhood, where wearing ties was not a necessary social grace, but I soon learned that to be a big man on campus a tie was de rigueur. I quickly mastered color coordination and how to make a nifty Windsor knot as if I had been doing it for years. Ever since I have been very fastidious about wearing a tie.

As I was saying, it's not that I don't own a tie, it's just that I decided that I wasn't going to wear it, at least for the summer.

In accordance with a well-known principle, the air conditioning in our house packed it in during the longest sustained heat wave of the early summer. With each passing day as the serviceman promised to come, and didn't, the temperature in the house kept building up. By the fifth day even the night temperature stayed at the century mark (my thermostat is still on the Fahrenheit scale) and sleeping was almost impossible.

That morning standing before the mirror preparing to brave the world, uncomfortable and crankier than usual, I saw this guy tying a thing around his neck, when it suddenly struck me — Why am I doing this? Will it make me more comfortable; will it make me more handsome; will it serve any useful purpose? The answer to each question was no. Logic reigned. The tie was returned to the rack and I haven't worn one all summer.

The recent completion of a major project in our office called for an appropriate celebration — an elegant dinner with our client. The enterprising office resource person found out that an upscale hotel was catering a kosher function and if we would accept the menu fixed for the function, we could have our party of 12 served in the hotel's main dining room. That dining room is best known for its social status, where the pretentious maitre d' sneers at you and the servers intimidate, leaving the distinct impression that they are bestowing a favor by merely waiting on your table. However the occasion warranted the humiliation and dinner was arranged.

Jack Chisvin

Of course the dining room has a dress code. The fish and chip shop near our cottage also has a dress code — there it encourages the diners to wear a shirt and shoes — but here it is a euphemism for wearing a tie and coat. A constraint not imposed on women, but only on liberated men.

I arrived early, a paragon of sartorial splendor, if I do say so myself, with shoes polished, a knife-edge crease in my trousers, a freshly laundered sport shirt and my latest acquisition in blazers draped over my shoulders. Yet the maitre d' was appalled. I was still 10 feet away and already his lips were pursed. He was not going to let me through the door and have a slob denigrate his restaurant. Reluctantly he condescended to talk to me. Perhaps I was only delivering a message.

"M'sie?" (with much affection).

"Has anyone from Mr. Chisvin's party arrived yet? I asked.

"M'sieu Chisvin? A party of 12 I believe, not yet, but M'sieu cannot eat with us, a tie is required." (with finality).

"But I've dressed like this all summer, eaten at the best restaurants even at . . ." I was cut short.

"I understand, but here it is not allowed."

"I see" — and my nimble mind began to race, I was about to enjoy the sweetest, most delicious restaurant experience of my life.

"Well, when M'sheu Chisvin's party arrives tell them the reservation has been changed to that restaurant on Bathurst Street. You know, the one with the faded crepe paper in the store front and where they speak mamaloschen. Au revoir."

As I walked away he was after me. I couldn't believe it, I was being chased by a maitre d'! He wanted me. He was spastic with movement — those effected, put-down, pussy gestures were all gone now. "We can arrange a tie for M'sieu." He was shameless with greed; that fat tip on a 12-plate l'addition was being lost!

I left the hotel feeling like David slaying Goliath; like Judah Macabee defeating the Romans. I know why battles are won or lost. The victory goes to those who are not tied by convention.

Neo-Nazi trip yields results

From Dresden, Sheldon Kirshner surveys the radical right-wing scene in what was East Germany.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Neo-Nazis in Yad Vashem?

The very idea is enough to make one's flesh crawl.

Yet as crazy as it sounds, this is precisely what happened last autumn, when 19 right-wing radicals from the Dresden area descended on the Holocaust memorial-cum-museum in Jerusalem.

Marita Schieferdecker-Adolph, the well-meaning, liberal-minded city official in charge of relations with foreign residents in Dresden, dreamed up the scheme.

Her motivations were clear.

She was concerned by the upsurge of neo-Nazi violence in eastern Germany, particularly in Dresden, and figured that a fact-finding mission to Israel might moderate anti-Semitic attitudes and ultimately be of educational value.

And though she rates the trip as a success, the uproar it generated, in both Germany and Israel, sorely tempted her to quit her job.

A year later, the trip remains a source of contention.

Heinz-Joachim Aris, the executive director of Dresden's Jewish community, believes it was basically a sound idea. But he's irritated that he was not consulted, and he doubts whether it really changed hearts and minds.

Steffen Heitmann, the minister of justice in the state of Saxony, expressed ambivalence as well. "It's questionable whether Jews should have been part of the delegation," he said, referring to the six Jews from Germany who accompanied the neo-Nazis. "Yet dialogue is a good thing."

More such trips should be undertaken, provided they're carefully planned and supported by the Israeli side, he noted.

Schieferdecker-Adolph, a striking 48-year-old with Mediterranean features, conceived the project as a way of fighting the increasing incidence of xenophobia and anti-Semitism in Dresden, a city of 500,000 which was firebombed and nearly levelled by Allied aircraft in 1945.

With the formation of the German Democratic Republic following the war, all manifestations of right-wing nationalism and neo-fascism were stoutly suppressed by the communist authorities. East Germany was held up as a model state where racial tolerance, brotherhood and internationalism flourished.

These utopian concepts were avidly promoted by the hardline Communist regime. But with its ouster in 1989 and its replacement by a reformist coalition government, latent racism, which had been kept in check all these years, bubbled to the surface.

In 1989, the public prosecutor's office in East Berlin investigated 296 cases of neo-Nazi violence, compared to 185 the year before. Jewish cemeteries, in particular, were repeatedly defaced. Such was the situation that the Ministry of Interior issued a report acknowledging that foreigners, homosexuals and Jews had become the targets of neo-fascist thugs.

The xenophobic, anti-Semitic violence, a problem the authorties had preferred to paper over prior to the late 1980s, increased by leaps and bounds in 1990, when East and West Germany amalgamated:

☐In Goerlitz, adjacent to the Polish border, walls were painted with the slogan, "Juden Raus" (Jews Out).

☐And in Dresden, neo-Nazis, shouting "Seig Heil" and "Auslanders Raus" (foreigners out), staged several vocal marches through the centre of town.

The climate of rising intolerance prompted Jewish communities throughout East Germany, for the first time, to request police protection, according to Robin Ostow, a Toronto-based sociologist who writes on German affairs.

Ostow adds that, in 1991, anti-Semitic agitation escalated, with attacks against Soviet Jewish emigrants in locales ranging from Brandenburg to Glauchau.

In 1992, vandals torched a former barrack for Jewish prisoners at the Sachsenhausen Holocaust memorial. The Rheinischer Merkur reported that two-thirds of the estimated 5,000 militant neo-Nazi skinheads in Germany were from the five eastern states.

Analysts explain that neo-Nazism emerged for a number of related reasons — high unemployment, a housing shortage, an increase in crime, the legacy of anti-Zionist propaganda which had been disseminated by East Germany, inadequate attempts to come to terms with the Nazi past and, of course, latent racism. These factors were aggravated by the presence of foreign contract workers, especially from Africa and Asia.

In addition, in Heitmann's view, neo-Nazism was a function of opposition to the repressive nature of the regime and of the communism it espoused.

During this period, Dresden became a bastion of right-wing radicalism. Its most notorious neo-Nazi activist, Rainer Sonntag, was gunned down by an assassin in June 1991.

"Anti-Semitism was very strong in Dresden," says Schieferdecker-Adolph, whose family is of French Huguenot ancestry.

But today, she asserts, Dresden no longer claims title to that dubious honor. Strong police work, limits on the right of assembly for neo-Nazis and an outreach program at schools and youth clubs account in large part for the decline of neo-Nazi violence in Dresden.

It was against this background of escalating racism that Schieferdecker-Adolph came up with the idea of reaching out to neo-Nazis and converting them into law-abiding, tolerant citizens.

In April 1993, she organized an encounter between a bunch of neo-Nazis and a group of Holocaust survivors in Munich. "It was a very intense meeting," she observes. "The survivors convinced them that the gas chambers are not a hoax."

Chastened by their conversations with survivors, the neo-Nazis suggested that a trip to Auschwitz would be appropriate. Schieferdecker-Adolph made a counter proposal — Yad Vashem.

She went to Israel to explore the possibility. "The people in Yad Vashem were very open to my idea."

Most of all, she believes, they were moved by the children's memorial. Beyond that, they were forced to acknowledge the reality of the Holocaust, which they had denied; forced to look into the dark soul of Germany, which had committed crimes against humanity; forced to re-examine their skewed beliefs about Jews; and forced to reassess the insensitive Jewish jokes at which they had always laughed.

As a result of their experiences in Israel, they have stopped lashing out at Jews as a group, though some have made harsh comments about Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

"They're still obsessively nationalistic, but they're not neo-Nazis any more," Schieferdecker-Adolph says. "They wouldn't physically assault a foreigner again."

In bringing them to Israel, she also hoped to dilute their biased view of the Jewish state — the butt of anti-Zionist media campaigns in the former East Germany.

"I wanted to correct the image, propagated by East Germany, that Israel is exterminating the Arabs."

In this respect, she appears to have partially succeeded. "One guy described Israel as 'cool.' Another wants to return with his family." Several, however, were critical of Israel's Law of Return (which grants automatic citizenship to Jews).

Still others, the racism welling up in them, voiced contempt for Arabs.

In retrospect, she would hesitate to lead a similar mission to Israel again, despite her feeling that it would be beneficial for both sides.

Marita Schieferdecker-Adolph [Frank Schroder]

The trip to Israel, paid for by the municipality of Dresden, attracted 19 right-wing radicals and seven Jews, including five emigrants from the former Soviet Union, ranging in age from 16 to 28.

They spent 10 days in Israel, stopping in Jerusalem, Tiberias, Eilat and the Galilee. They did not set foot in the territories.

The trip, as might have been expected, was marked by tension.

One of the Jewish participants couldn't abide the company of the neo-Nazis. And their guide at Yad Vashem, a German convert to Judaism, didn't attempt to conceal her disdain for the rightists.

Furthermore, the German embassy in Tel Aviv appeared embarrassed by the whole affair, largely because the Jerusalem Post had carried an inaccurate story claiming that some of the neo-Nazis had refused to visit Yad Vashem.

German newspapers picked up this story, and suddenly, Schieferdecker-Adolph found herself besieged by criticism.

In point of fact, Yad Vashem left a strong impact on the neo-Nazis. "They knew that it is not an amusement park."

"It caused a great commotion, here and abroad," she explains. "I think that German politicians would be reluctant to see another trip of this kind."

And, she says, the adverse publicity triggered by the trip jeopardized her job.

Schieferdecker-Adolph, though, is very much interested in organizing a trip to Auschwitz for right-wing radicals. The Central Council of Jews in Germany has offered its cooperation, and she believes she can make it happen in 1995.

Once mistakenly attacked as a Jew by a neo-Nazi in Dusseldorf, she maintains that the federal government can do still more to combat right-wing extremism and to foster tolerance and pluralism.

She recommends the introduction of more Holocaust education courses in schools, an accelerated program of visits to Holocaust memorials in Germany, and funding for a greater number of specially-trained social workers to work with juvenile delinquents inclined toward racist behavior.

"It's important that Germany doesn't deny its past for the sake of its image. It's important to attack the roots of racism."

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

"We have, so to speak, an (Israeli) consulate general in Berlin for the first time in 2,000 years."

Mordechay Lewy is speaking and he is deliberately indulging in a bit of undiplomatic hyperbole.

A little background:

In October 1991, after West and East Germany fused into one unified nation, Israel opened a consulate-general in the once and future capital of Germany. Lewy, a seasoned diplomat, was appointed the first consul general.

At the time, Israel maintained an embassy in Bonn, its only diplomatic office in West Germany. Israel, which had established formal diplomatic relations with Bonn in 1965, had no representation in East Germany, West Germany's Communist rival on the other side of the Berlin Wall.

A hardline Marxist state, East Germany was the sole Warsaw Pact country which had never officially recognized Israel. Negotiations to establish ties got under way in late 1989, following the fall of the Berlin Wall, the resignation of Communist party boss Erich Honecker and the formation of a reformist government in East Germany.

But these talks were essentially an exercise in futility, since the momentum for unification had already begun. This, in fact, occurred in October 1990. So, for the official record, East Germany passed into history without having established formal links with Israel.

With East Germany's demise, Israel took the first of several steps which climaxed with the opening of a consulate general in Berlin. Its mandate and purpose are clear — to penetrate what had been East Germany.

"Our goal is to build up an extensive network of contacts," Lewy added. "For 40 years, we were excluded from eastern Germany."

A related objective is to disseminate information about Israel, the Jewish people and the Holocaust. Until the late 1980s, East Germans were subjected to a barrage of anti-Zionist rhetoric which portrayed Israel as an aggressive, Western imperialist outpost in the Middle East.

Israel in Berlin

And in line with its ideological orientation, the East German education system did not regard Jews as a people and underplayed the Holocaust as a uniquely Jewish tragedy.

Lewy, a 46-year-old fluent German speaker whose parents emigrated from Germany in 1938, has worked assiduously to change all that.

On the political level, he has cultivated relations with the governments of all five eastern German states — Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, Brandenburg, Saxony-Anhalt, Saxony and Thuringia. To date, most of their premiers have visited Israel.

Lewy has promoted cultural ties. There have been a series of Israel Weeks, featuring art exhibitions, concerts, film screenings, book fairs and dance troupes, in 14 towns and cities.

"There's a great interest in things Israeli," said Lewy. "We depict Israel as a Jewish state. We don't separate Israel from the Jewish world."

University exchanges have taken place, and Jewish studies programs have been set up in Leipzig, Halle and Potsdam.

Teachers have been sent to Israel to study ancient and modern Israel. And Lewy himself has appeared in schools to deliver lectures on the Holocaust.

Scientific cooperation has begun, but Israel cannot meet the demand in such fields as chemistry, physics and microbiology.

Trade is yet another item on the agenda. With 17 million consumers, the market in eastern Germany is potentially lucrative. At the opposite end, Israel is seen as a possible importer of railway locomotives and cars.

Few Israelis have invested in eastern Germany's economy, but those who've taken the plunge are in telecommunications and high technology.

Lewy, who was scheduled to leave his post in July to become Israel's ambassador in Thailand, is basically satisfied with his accomplishments in Berlin, particularly in the cultural and political spheres.

"We've changed minds and filled in gaps," he said. "There's still a lot to be done, but the situation has improved."

Quebec independent slams PQ, Liberals

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Robert Libman, the independent candidate for D'Arcy McGee, has launched a strong attack on Parti Quebecois (PQ) leader Jacques Parizeau, even though the PQ is not expected to garner many votes in the riding.

Libman set up a computer screen at the front of his Cavendish Mall election office which shows Quebec's debt as it mounts by the second. Libman termed it "the ticking timebomb" Parizeau left taxpayers from the time he was finance minister during the PQ's first government 1976-81.

At a press conference where he flipped the computer switch, Libman charged that the total public sector debt grows at a rate of $13,800 per minute. The "doomsday debt clock" is to tick away until the end of the campaign.

Libman lashed into Parizeau after he calculated that the promises the PQ leader had made during one weekend of the campaign alone added up to $200 million.

The computer keeps track of four categories of debt: the government's accumulated deficits; the province's unfunded pension liabilities; the total public sector debt (including Hydro-Quebec, Crown corporations, municipalities and school boards); and the share each Quebecer owes — over $18,000, by Libman's reckoning.

From 1976-77, Quebec's deficit shot up from $801 million to over $5 billion, says Libman using Statistics Canada as his source. The biggest jump took place during the PQ's two mandates; by the time the party lost power, the deficit was $3.5 billion.

Liberal candidate Lawrence Bergman, whose office is also in the mall, did not respond directly to Libman on this point, or any other.

"Mr. Libman is seeking headlines; I'm seeking to build bridges and to advance the interests of the community within the corridors of government," Bergman said. "The main issue in this election is [national] unity, and when the Liberals are elected we will have the tools to stengthen the economy, create jobs and attract investment and that will bring political stability."

Libman has, of course, also been criticizing the Liberals. "The dumping by Daniel Johnson of the only anglophone from cabinet [Sam Elkas], the refusal to even consider widening access for English-speaking immigrants to English schools which is a vital measure needed for the anglophone community to survive, the gross underrepresentation of anglophones in the Quebec civil service and the choice of Yvon Charbonneau as a Liberal candidate are all examples of how anglophones are still taken for granted by the Quebec Liberal Party," Libman stated, in response to the party's direct soliciting of the anglophone vote.

Libman called on whoever forms the government to immediately adopt the recommendation of the committee on English education, chaired by Gretta Chambers, that immigrants to Quebec from English-speaking countries be allowed to send their children to English schools.

Bergman's response is that he wonders why Libman sought to be a Liberal candidate if he is in so much disagreement with the party. "There is an inconsistency here. If only a few months ago [last December], Mr. Libman asked to be accepted as a Liberal, he must have agreed wholeheartedly in our policies, if he is sincere."

There's been a marked difference in Libman and Bergman's campaigns. Libman has been cranking out press statements almost daily, while the Bergman camp has been relatively quiet.

"I'm working hard within government, with ministers on various issues. Even though I'm only a candidate, I've had easy access to ministers. I think I've been effective behind the scenes," said Bergman.

Bergman's campaign manager Jonathan Schneiderman said an announcement will be made by the Liberals, perhaps from Premier Daniel Johnson himself, that will be of significance to the Jewish community, probably later this month.

Bergman would not make a public comment, but it likely will concern funding of the Jewish day schools.

Both candidates got their posters up this week, after Libman made a false start July 25, the day after the election was called. The chief electoral officer agreed with a complaint from Bergman that such advertising was a violation of the Election Act.

"We knew the law; he did not," said Schneiderman. "This shows the weakness of an independent candidate. [Libman] does not have a party to back him up, to do research."

Libman said he is not ignorant of the law; he was just trying to test its limits. "The Quebec election law is not as specific as the federal act. It speaks of a ban on publicity, like newspaper ads, [until 29 days before the election] but does not specifically mention posters.

Orthodox men's club mixes sailing and religion on the open waters

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Every Monday evening throughout the summer, a group of Orthodox young men gather at the Island Yacht Club to prepare for an intra-club race.

They are, with one exception, all members of the Agudath Israel South Synagogue. Although they all enjoy sailing, they formed their competitive group two years ago for the friendships.

"I wanted to expose members of my shul to the sailing fraternity and for the camaraderie that goes on at the IYC," says endodontist, Dr. Barry Korzen who is the skipper. Korzen, a member of the IYC, who has been sailing for more than 25 years, is an associate professor in the Faculty of Dentistry at the University of Toronto and former chair of the Endodontic Department.

He told The CJN that the group daven on board the boat and enjoy having a snack together before settling down to the task of sailing. Team member, Hershy Weinberg, who is in the clothing business, has become the on-board caterer — "the kiddush gabbai on the boat," says Korzen.

Lawyer and businessman, Randy Shiff, a loyal team member, has been sailing since he was 8 years old and he taught sailing at several summer camps. He is the only team member who is not a member of Agudath Israel and says, "I am a renegade from Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue."

The crew members also include cardiologist, Dr. Joseph Minkowitz, lawyer, Steven Nemetz, and businessman, Berl Bessin.

More than 35 boats compete on Monday nights. There are five categories, divided by size and boat type.

"While drifting along, the crew talks about Israel, politics. We tell Lubavitch stories and discuss many other subjects," says Shiff.

"We are a very close knit group," says Korzen. "We attend minyan during the week, daven together on Shabbos; and the sailing team carries us even closer." He adds that although competition is not their priority, the team did win a race this season, to the surprise of the team members.

Korzen notes that, as well as sailing, Agudath South has a cycling club headed by Weinberg.

N.Y. Orthodox group tours B.C.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Ninety Orthodox New York men and women, members of Touring Friends of Canada, were in British Columbia recently to visit Jewish communities in Kelowna, Vancouver and Victoria.

The group flew from New York to Calgary, where they boarded two buses for a trip through the Rockies to visit the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) in Kelowna, a city in the province's interior. Community president Anita Nadler and past-president Mel Kotler welcomed them, and the group was entertained at the new OJC community centre where Nadler lead them in singing Israeli songs.

The following morning the men held a service in the synagogue, using their own Torah. The rest of the tour arrived for breakfast, hosted by Nadler.

Then it was on to Vancouver where they were entertained and held services at Schara Tzedeck synagogue.

The tour continued by ferry to Victoria where the New Yorkers set up headquarters at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) for meals and services. They were greeted in Victoria by JCC president Diana Shneider, and Annette Rose. The visitors toured the famed Butchart Gardens and Congregation Emanu-El, the oldest synagogue in continuous use on the West Coast of North America.

The visitors were also given a front seat at Victoria's Symphony Splash, an outdoor event which features the Victoria Symphony Orchestra playing on a barge in the middle of the harbour. More than 40,000 people attended this annual concert.

Food for the tourists was prepared by their own glatt kosher caterer, Joel Weinberger of Los Angeles. Taking advantage of the fact that this is the height of the salmon season here, he used 27 salmon in preparing the meals.

The tour was arranged by Leah Krasnov of New York.

Senior remembers missing war heroes

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — News that a veterans' group is trying to trace two missing Israeli war heroes — cousins Harvey Cohen and Ed Lucatch of Toronto — struck a responsive chord with Louis Lieberman, 92, of Toronto.

Lieberman and Harvey's father, David Cohen, were close friends who worked together for nine years at Reliable Upholstery.

"That oak dining room set with six chairs I bought for $40 from David when he gave up everything in Toronto in 1950 or 1951 to go and look for his son who had disappeared without a trace," Lieberman told The CJN.

"I never heard from David directly, but a year or so later a cousin of his showed me a letter from him saying he didn't find out anything and he was having a hard time in Israel. Not too long after, the cousin told me David died a miserable death there. I've never heard from his wife or three other children who also went to Israel."

Lieberman knew Harvey Cohen as an idealistic youth who was not even 19 when he volunteered to serve with Haganah, even before the State of Israel was declared. He often visited the Lieberman house which was on Brunswick Avenue, north of Harbord Street, and within walking distance of the Cohen house on the same street closer to College Street.

"According to the letter his cousin received from David, Harvey and Ed were given an undercover assignment in Jordan and were dressed as Bedouins for their assignment."

A recent letter to The CJN from Sidney Rabinovitch of the American Veterans of Israel states that the two cousins were reported to have arrived at the Tel Litwinsky induction centre early in June, 1948, and within days were missing in action.

"No one has yet claimed to have actually met or seen the cousins in Israel or on the way there," Rabinovich wrote.

Though David Cohen was not a Zionist zealot, he favored Israel's cause, and had no objection to his son's volunteering to fight for its independence.

In his comfortable apartment on Goldfinch Court, decorated with many needlepoint hangings and cushions he has done himself, Lieberman finds it easier to talk about his friend David than about the missing hero.

"He was a brilliant Talmudist and in our lunch breaks in a little room downstairs at the upholstery factory he would regale the 40 or so Jewish workers with tales of the old days. To think that he took all his tools and his possessions to Israel, hoping to open a shop there. As his cousin said — in those days Israel had no great need of upholsterers."

The memories of a full life, photographs and other mementos, give a warm charm to the Lieberman apartment. Included are photos of his three children, seven grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

His wife, Annie, died last year at the age of 88, after 22 years as a semi-invalid. They celebrated their 65th wedding anniversary, but his wife was too ill to take part in any further observances.

His son, Stanley, is a Toronto lawyer. One daughter, Norma Better, lives in Baltimore, while another, Goldie Ross, is a therapist at North York General Hospital.

Asked if he had any clues as to the whereabouts of Harvey Cohen, Lieberman said: "If anybody could have found him, it would have been his father."

ASI helps Israeli soldiers

TORONTO — During the hot days of an Israeli summer, soldiers and their families can enjoy some much needed rest and relaxation thanks to help from the Toronto branch of the Association for the Soldiers of Israel.

The branch helps support two programs, one for soldiers on active duty with the Israel Defence Forces, another for the widows and orphaned children of soldiers killed defending the state.

Units of up to 600 soldiers are brought from the front lines to enjoy five days of holiday. The khaki army pants are replaced by jeans and bathing suits; the flak jackets by colorful printed T-shirts; the heavy boots by thongs or Nikes. The soldiers are pampered, enjoying five meals a day, swimming, sports, evening entertainment and dances with female soldiers from non-combat units.

The Toronto branch of the association is building an air conditioned 20-room dormitory to house 80 soldiers at Ashkelon, in a former absorption absorption centre for Ethiopian immigrants.

The Toronto Branch has been a major contributor of funds for this program for eight years. Money raised through the annual Chanukah Candle Campaign, as well as part of the funds raised through the gift cards program of the branch, are designated for this program.

For information, contact the Association for Soldiers of Israel, 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 201, Toronto, Ont. M6B 3K1.

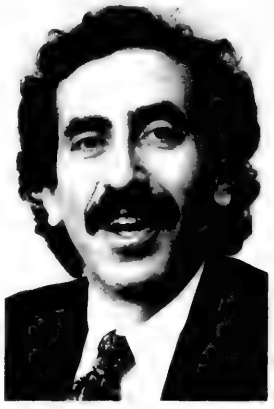
Bernstein gets nod for Mount Sinai post

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN



Dr. Alan Bernstein

TORONTO — Dr. Alan Bernstein was recently named director of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital. The announcement was made by Lloyd S. D. Fogler, chairman of the board and Theodore J. Freedman, president and chief executive officer of Mount Sinai Hospital.

Bernstein was first recruited to the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute as head of the Division of Molecular and Developmental Biology. He served as its associate director where he worked closely with Dr. Louis Siminovitch, the retiring director of research. Siminovitch will continue his involvement with the institute and the hospital in a consultative capacity as director emeritus.

Born in Toronto, Bernstein earned his PhD in Medical Biophysics at the University of Toronto. He completed a postdoctoral fellowship at the Imperial Cancer Research Fund Laboratories in London, England. He served as a Senior Scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute for 10 years before joining the institute.

The Lunenfeld Research Institute is about to embark on a major expansion of its laboratory space to establish a new program in Human Genome research aimed at understanding the genetic predisposition of various diseases, including cancer, diabetes, asthma, bone diseases, drug and alcohol addiction and various mental disorders.

In an explanation of the process called gene therapy, Bernstein notes that all over the world, scientists are in the midst of a massive global effort to "crack" the human genetic code, to learn where important genes are on the human chromosomes, exactly what they do, and how they go wrong and lead to human disease.

This undertaking, he says, is one of the most ambitious and important scientific efforts in history.

"The 20th century may well be remembered as much for the Genome project as for other achievements, such as the space program," says Bernstein. "The sheer scope of the project is overwhelming."

He notes that genetic analysis forms the basis of much of the work at the institute, including studies in autoimmunity, neurology, embryological development, as well as breast, colon and other types of cancer.

Bernstein's own interest lies in cancer and blood formation. He and some of his colleagues in the institute, such as Dr. Tony Pawson, are particularly interested in how cells communicate with each other to keep the body functioning properly.

The institute, which was established in 1985, is widely recognized as one of Canada's premier biomedical research facilties, with a research staff of more than 300 and an annual budget of over $20 million, of which three-quarters is secured from national and international peer-review funding and contracts with biotechnology and pharmaceutical companies.

The institute's research programs range from basic studies on the molecular biology of development of cancer to clinical research in a wide spectrum of patient care areas. The institute's major programs include Development and Fetal Health, Cancer and Molecular Biology, and Clinical Epidemiology.

Bernstein explains: "Cells talk to each other — they transmit specific messages such as hormones, to be received by other cells, which can then carry out their necessary functions. It is a very balanced network always under strict control.

"But if mutations occur in some of the genes that control this communication process, the system is disrupted. The transmitting cells can send garbled messages. Alternatively, the receiving cells can misinterpret or not even be able to respond to the incoming messages."

Bernstein says that the institute consciously attempts to combine basic scientific research with clinical research. "This policy has helped keep the institute on the leading edge of research, both in Canada and internationally. By combining clinical and fundamental insights, scientists and physicians cross-fertilize each other's ideas. The result is a research program with a broader perspective."

Noting the reality that research dollars are scarce and that there is competition for funding, Bernstein optimistically adds that with the support of the institute's board and the community, "In the next few years, we have the opportunity to build on our successes and our strengths, enhancing our reputation as a world-class research facility."

The 47-year-old internationally recognized scientist holds the Anne Tanenbaum Chair in Molecular and Developmental Biology and is a professor of Molecular and Medical Genetics at the U of T. He is widely known for his significant contributions to the understanding of the molecular basis of cancer, blood cell formation and retrovirology.

A member of the board of directors of the National Cancer Institute of Canada, Bernstein chairs the International Scientific Council of the Israel Cancer Research Fund.

Bonds to fete Greenbaum

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Described as "an exemplary Jewish woman" and long recognized as one of this community's busiest and most committed volunteers, Cheryl Greenbaum has been named this year's State of Israel Bonds women's division honoree.

The tribute to Greenbaum will take place at the women's division annual gala luncheon on Oct. 5, 12 noon at Adas Israel Synagogue.

The keynote speaker will be well-known American educator and Jewish community leader, Jeanette Eichenwald. A vice-president of the American Jewish Congress, Eichenwald is the child of Holocaust survivors and a passionate speaker who draws on her own life experiences as well as events facing modern Jewry.

Greenbaum is the immediate past chair of Hamilton Bonds women's division, a former United Jewish Appeal (UJA) women's division chair and current co-chair of the 1994-95 UJA general campaign.

Greenbaum grew up in an Orthodox home, the eldest of the four children of Sylvia and the late Morris Klein. Following public and high school education in Dundas, she graduated from the University of Toronto medical school with honors and went on to specialize in internal medicine and hematology.

Dr. Cheryl Greenbaum

Married 22 years to former Torontonian, allergist Dr. Joseph Greenbaum, she shelved her career for a number of years while raising six sons. She recently returned to work as a consultant in hematology at St. Joseph's Hospital.

Following the example set by her late grandmother and her mother, herself a former Bonds women's division honoree, Greenbaum always found time to volunteer. She is a life member of Hadassah-WIZO, where she served as treasurer of her chapter, as well as of Emunah Women and ORT.

She also continues to serve on the executive board of Israel Bonds, is actively involved in Adas Israel Sisterhood and has served on the Parent Teacher Association (PTA) of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, where her three youngest sons, Moshe, Rafi and Ari are still pupils.

Her husband is president of Adas Israel congregation and their sons' education reflects the couple's deep commitment to Judaism and Israel.

After spending a year at a yeshivah in Israel, the eldest, Eli, is in his first year at Yeshiva University in New York, where he won the prestigious Max Stern scholarship. The next two are also studying at a yeshivah, Dov in Israel, and Yale in Hamilton at the Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak.

Women's division chair for the 1994-95 campaign is Stephanie McLean, while Flora Rams is vice-chair.

Luncheon couvert is $18 per person. For reservations call the Hamilton Bonds office at (905) 528-8639.

York Region seniors oppose course costs

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 100 seniors from Vaughan and Markham, who are facing steep increases in the fees for courses they take at Bernard Betel Centre, have decided to organize a protest and petition local politicians to help them out.

Up to now, the North York Board of Education and the Betel Centre have subsidized these courses for Betel members who live north of Steeles Avenue and are therefore outside Metro Toronto.

But faced with a cut in their own funds, they can no longer afford the subsidization. As a result, the seniors from such places as Thornhill and Richmond Hill face fees of $180 for a 12-week course or $7.50 per hour of instruction. If it is a course which runs for three semesters, the cost would be $540.

The courses run a wide gamut, including fitness, needlecraft, soapstone sculpture, current events, Yiddish, Bible study, music appreciation, ballroom dancing, Hebrew, pottery, yoga, English as a second language, basic bridge and creative choir.

"There is a perception that York Region is full of couples with young children and that there are no seniors," Sharon Zeiler of the Betel staff told a meeting of 35 seniors from York.

Those at the meeting said there are few resources available for seniors in York and none to match the courses offered by the North York Board of Education.

"My husband, Manny, and I come to the centre three times a week for the North York courses," said Ida Ross, of Thornhill.

Another member from Thornhill said the courses are needed because they provide seniors with the motivation to keep up with the world instead of vegetating.

Program Director Norma Steiner said the centre has no quarrel with the North York Board of Education, but recalled that it took a massive show of interest by centre members to convince the North York Board to continue to offer its courses to seniors under favorable conditions.

Program organizer Bookie Kwart suggested that with an election coming up, centre seniors from York region should attend candidate meetings for York Board of Education and ask questions about services for seniors.

Before the meeting ended, a petition was circulated addressed to York Council and York Board of Education.

Noyek family reunion draws 175 family members

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Davida Noyek Handler, who lives in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, once owned a translation company but gave it up in the early 1980s to concentrate on researching her family tree.

Thanks largely to her research skills and perseverance, some 175 Noyek family members from six countries attended a first-ever family gathering at the Holiday Inn Yorkdale in Toronto this summer.

"We took a print-out of the family tree, which has about 1,500 names on it, and stretched it across three walls of the conference room," Handler recalled. "It was just enormous. It took about six and a half hours for a group of us to mount this thing on the walls. When people came in, they went directly to the tree, found their branch of the family, and saw how it related to the other branches. It was a really good icebreaker."

The gathering was held over the Canada Day-July 4th weekend; Toronto was the chosen site because several branches of the family are located here. Each spells its surname differently, however, so until Handler did her research they were not sure they were related.

"We always thought we came from a small family," said David Noik, owner of a lumber company in Toronto. "All of a sudden, we realized the family was much larger."

The weekend opened with an Oneg Shabbat, and on Saturday Handler explained to her relatives how she had fit all the pieces of the vast international genealogical puzzle together. She used such diverse sources as U.S. passenger lists and naturalization records, Irish civil registration records, and 19th-century Jewish records for various towns in Lithuania, which she found in the Mormon's Family History Library.

Afterwards, a representative of each branch of the family gave a short presentation, explaining how their ancestors had left Lithuania for their respective countries, and how they had survived there. But as in most Jewish families, there were many relatives who had not survived. A poem was read in dedication to family members killed by the Cossacks, or in the Russian-Japanese war, or in the Holocaust, or during the harsh Stalinist era. As well, a group photograph was taken.

Handler has determined the surname Noyek was invented by Joseph, the son of the earliest known patriarch, Shmuel Similovitch (born about 1798). Joseph purportedly took the name for himself and his family because he needed a non-Jewish-sounding surname to outsmart the dreaded chappers (grabbers), Russian soldiers who nabbed Jewish boys for an obligatory 25- or 35-year term in the Russian army.

For Handler, one of the best moments of the gathering was when she met a relative from South Africa, Leonard Israelsohn, who represented a branch of the tree she had been seeking for years. Israelsohn had heard of the gathering and dropped by to see what it was all about while in Toronto visiting his son.

"He added 46 names, addresses and telephone numbers to our list of relatives," Handler said. "We had no idea these people existed — we were writing names on the wall until 1 a.m. I get very emotional thinking about this because it was the end of a 10-year search, looking for that particular branch of the family."

Toronto relatives who attended the gathering unanimously said it exceeded their expectations. Dr. Minna Noik Stein, a Toronto dentist who is the deputy registrar of the Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, said it was exciting to meet representatives of the family from Canada, the United States, Israel, England, South Africa and Ireland. "My kids are normally blase about most things — my daughter is going to be 19 and my son is going to be 21 — but even they were blown away by this," she said.

The Noyek family.

"Everyone had wonderful stories to tell," said Rose Noyek Farber, who still speaks with a faint Irish lilt almost four decades after coming to Toronto from her native Dublin. Although she tripped and broke her leg on a speed-bump outside the hotel, she has happy memories of the occasion, and hopes there will be another in a couple of years.

That would probably suit Dr. Arnold Noyek, chief of ear, nose and throat surgery at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. Along with Handler, Noik, Stein and Farber, Dr. Noyek was on the planning committee and also served as emcee.

"This family's history is a microcosm of Jewish survival," he mused. "The migrations, the persecutions ... we've had to contend with the Cossacks, the Nazis, the right-wing elements in the liberation of Lithuania, the Stalinists. ... We're looking at just a little piece of human history, and it's so reflective of the human will to survive. I find it very moving.

"The pride I take in this family is that this is a family that doesn't slow down. It's a tenacious family; look at the individuals. They're high-energy people who aren't about to get derailed."

For Handler, whose genealogical research made the family gathering possible, the work is far from over. Although she has published the family history in two impressive volumes, material keeps flowing in, and there are many corrections and additions to be made.

"I feel that other than raising my children, it's probably the most important thing I've ever down in my life," she said.

Discover the Difference

Warm and Cozy

As the days get shorter and the nights get cooler, Lawrence Plaza is turning up the heat.

Classic brown is back! Bringing with it warm colours like coffee, chocolate and cappuccino. These can be mixed and matched exceptionally well with all the natural colours from the past couple of seasons.

For business, a deep, rich brown suit coupled with a crisp white shirt speaks volumes. Tweeds and tartans remain, as always, a traditional part of Fall. A colourful tartan argyle vest looks effortlessly chic with dark solids or tweeds -- and it's just the ticket to brighten any business suit.

Suits are more flattering and less restricting with longer, more tailored jackets and skirts that are on the rise. Anything goes from playful mini to conservative just-above-the-knee lengths.

For something slightly more relaxed team skirts or pants with this seasons influx of sweaters. Whether long and loose or short and fitted, mohair, cashmere or angora, sweaters add warmth, texture and variety to whatever they're matched with. Wear them over extra lacy blouses or a tiny tank or by themselves. The combinations and possibilities are endless.

Denims continue to play an important role in every wardrobe. Try jeans teamed with a short fitted sweater for casual comfort or a soft, cashmere cardigan tied at the waist for a little hint of glamour.

Sheath dresses (otherwise known as jumpers) are a definite hit this season worn over soft, delicate sweaters of contrasting colours. This combination can work equally well for the office or for a night out on the town.

And for that special date or dinner party you can't beat the rich, sophisticated look of velvet. No matter what colour, velvet is so luxurious that you need little else than a simple strand of pearls or some ornamental gold earrings to complete the look.

To reveal your sense of playfulness experiment with intense, bold, hot colours over black. Nearly-neon pinks, bright oranges, icy blues, fire-engine reds and dazzling yellows all stand out brilliantly against black and will surely brighten any occasion.

Discover the difference at Lawrence Plaza...and warm up to everyday savings of 25 - 65 percent. You'll find lots of bargains on designer and brand name fashions, accessories, houseware, books and much more!

Look for "Plazette" - the Lawrence Plaza Newsletter in your mailbox for valuable updates on stores in the centre and highlights of seasonal fashion trends. If you don't receive one in the mail, call (416) 789-1178 for a free copy.

YESHIVA U GRADS

Eleven Ontario residents were among 70 students from Canada, United States and Israel to receive master of social work degrees at commencement exercises for the Block Plan of Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work in New York City.

The graduates are Margaret Ash of Etobicoke; Linda Brotman, Susan Brotman, Carolyn Cahin, Anat Feldhendler, Arthur Samuel and Cynthia Pink of Toronto; Jeffrey Fishbain of Ottawa; Wendy Kline of Richmond Hill; Rudy Kreindler of Don Mills and Asya Vit of Thornhill.

The Block Plan allows students to complete degree requirements for the MSW in three summers of study in New York City while working for social service agencies throughout the world during the traditional academic year. Students are also required to participate in supervised field work. Those already employed in appropriate agencies may use their work setting to fulfil this requirement provided the work assignment meets certain educational criteria.

The Wurzweiler School of Social Work, founded in 1957, offers master of social work and doctor of social welfare degrees through a variety of programs.

GIFT FOR BETH TORAH

Beth Torah Synagogue was the recipient of a gift of a framed declaration of the newly established State of Israel in 1948. Members Larry and Barbara Gross made the donation to the synagogue on the 46th anniversary of the State of Israel. The declaration belonged to Barbara Gross's late parents, Mr. and Mrs. I. Everett who resided in Saint John, N.B. [Mollie Rothman photo].

Is there life after divorce?

In a surprising development that will immeasurably help former spouses of retirees, an Ontario court recently ruled that a pension plan must pay survivor's pensions to divorced spouses. The ruling applies to all public and private pension plans and ex-spouses of pensioners who retired on or after January 1, 1987.

In the case of Smiley V. Ontario Pension Board, Mr. Justice Christopher Speyer's ruling (which is not being appealed) decides that someone who divorces his spouse can collect survivor's benefits, without that person still being married to the retiree prior to his or her death.

The case involved the former wife of an Ontario civil servant. On separation the couple agreed, in a separation agreement, that even if the retiree remarried or cohabited with a new partner, he would ensure that only the former spouse would be entitled to survivor benefits. However, the Pension Board would not permit the surviving former spouse's claim, notwithstanding the separation agreement. In overruling the Pension Board, the Court sets a critical precedent, giving former spouses the status of non-divorced spouses. In my opinion, it is now conceivable that the same principle could eventually be applied by the Courts to insurance plans, such as Extended Health Benefit Plans. I frequently have been asked by a spouse to delay a divorce because, by virtue of their spouse's employee health benefit plan, the client would be "cut out" of prescription drug/dental benefits once the divorce was finalized. Are we that far away from the Courts or the Legislature ensuring that former spouses continue to be covered by such plans? I think not. Of course, premiums for employers and some employees will escalate, particularly if claims from multiple spouses of the same survivor or employee begin pouring in.

For the moment, I advise anyone contemplating separation to look carefully at the terms of survivor's benefits in their employee/employer Pension plans and examine their limits carefully with the assistance of a competent lawyer and Pension consultant/accountant. Lawyers negotiating separation agreements must now also be very careful not to "give away" the right to survivor benefits by ignoring them. They must ensure this item is part of their "checklist" of goodies that form part of the non-pensioned spouse's rights in any separation agreement and ensure that the agreement confirms that the rights survive divorce. I would also include a provision putting the pension plan on formal notice of the rights of the recipient spouse to such benefits.

Needless to say, survivor's benefits should not be confused with the value of the pension itself (i.e. while the pensioner is still alive). Particularly after a long marriage, a pension often has a large value based on a prospective "stream of income". Actuaries are usually used to valuate lump sum values for these pensions for family law purposes, often considerably before the pension becomes payable. The value of the pension is then often split on a cash basis 50:50, or less, depending on the length of the marriage. The sale proceeds of many matrimonial homes on separation have not been split equally, precisely because one of the spouses is anticipating a large pension income on retirement. In many cases, he is expected to share this pension with his spouse on a "present cash" basis, and not when he retires.

New book puts author Ozick under the microscope

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It has long been debatable whether Jewish-American author Cynthia Ozick strives to be a serious writer or a writer of comedic tongue-in-cheek fiction.

Although Ozick's works have been thoroughly analyzed in several books and numerous critical articles, a recently published book, Cynthia Ozick's Comic Art: From Levity to Liturgy (Bloomington: Indiana University Press) by author, lecturer and playwright Sarah Blacher Cohen sheds new light on Ozick's enigmatic writing.

Cohen, in a telephone interview with The CJN, said that she believes that Ozick does not set out to make people laugh. "Nevertheless, in her originally clever fashion, she tells the whole embarrassing truth, which the art of comedy is dedicated to telling. She unhesitatingly reveals that the emperor has no clothes and she exposes the folly of those who insist he's dressed in the finest attire."

Cohen explains that Ozick portrays her hybrid conception of human nature by revealing that "we are not ethereal paragons of virtue, but earth-bound awkward creatures repeatedly committing the same mistakes and indiscretions, continually stumbling upon unforeseen obstacles, grappling with inevitable disruptions and reversals."

The conspicuous comic element of Ozick's fiction, argues Cohen, is comedy of character which exposes the tainted nature of her protagonists. Some of her characters are aware of their unsightly flaws and struggle to eliminate them, secure enough to make fun of themselves at their own expense. Cohen says that "their self-mockery elicits Ozick's sympathetic laughter."

Examining Ozick's characters under a microscope, Cohen sets her readers on a new path of understanding of the ironies and false images of Ozick's real-life creations. Transitions "from the flippant to the philosophic, from the risible to the moralistic," notes Cohen, "are present in most of Ozick's fiction and are the most prominent feature of her comedy of ideas."

Although Ozick has been influenced by the literary works of such writers as Henry James, Saul Bellow, Flannery O'Connor and George Eliot, "nevertheless, she strikes out on her own." Cohen describes Ozick as "an adroit juggler of many kinds of comic prose, which are often juxtaposed within an individual work."

Cohen is a professor of English at the State University of New York, Albany. She is the author of Saul Bellow's Enigmatic Laughter, and editor of From Hester Street to Hollywood, Jewish Wry, and Comic Relief.

In 1981, Cohen was awarded a Distinguished Fulbright Professorship to Yugoslavia where she lectured on Jewish American humor, fiction and drama.

Among her many plays, in 1984, Cohen collaborated with Isaac Bashevis Singer on an off-Broadway play, Schlemiel the First, which was produced at the Jewish Repertory Theatre.

She recently completed a new play with music, Molly Picon's Return Engagement which is being staged in cities throughout the United States.

Cohen will be attending the Second International Conference of Yiddish Clubs which will be held in Toronto in October.

Toronto UJA mission visits ancient shul

AUGUZ, Azerbaijan — Members of a Toronto UJA leadership mission recently stepped into a mysterious chapter of Jewish history when their helicopters landed in a soccer field in this mountain town.

Some 150 Jewish families live in this lush, forested region, high in the Caucasus mountains. Auguz is 175 kilometres from Baku, the capital of Azerbaijan, deep inside what was once the former Soviet Union.

The Jewish presence in Auguz is 2,600 years old, and the prevailing language is a dialect of Farsi from Persia.

The century-old Auguz synagogue was closed by the Communist regime in 1930, and transformed into a warehouse. Two years ago, the synagogue was returned to the Jewish community, restored and refurbished by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

The 14-member Toronto delegation attended the synagogue rededication ceremony under the curious stares of about 100 Jews who, according to 1995 UJA campaign co-chair Wendy Eisen, "appeared to have stepped out of the 18th century.

"Despite the fact that nobody had prayed there for 70 years, the Auguz community has managed to preserve its unique Jewish identity."

The Jews in Auguz have lived in harmony with their non-Jewish neighbors for centuries. However, they are now endangered by their proximity to the front lines in the war with Armenia, 40 kilometres away.

"Most mountain Jews are not concentrated in towns such as Auguz," said Dr. Baruch Gur, who heads Jewish Agency efforts in the former Soviet region. "They live in Baku, where the community is being assimilated at a much larger pace than any other Jewish group."

The agony of an ongoing war, political instability and economic deterioration have motivated more than 22,000 Azerbaijan Jews to make aliyah, with the Agency's help, during the past two years. Entire Jewish communities have been evacuated from the war zones. "It's just one example of how UJA rescues Jews in distant corners of the world," Eisen said.

North York youth gets top marks with an average of 99.5 per cent

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Howard Feldman cannot count the number of people who have asked him where he lost the extra marks on his Grade 13 report card.

Feldman, who just turned 19, recently graduated from Earl Haig Secondary School with a 99.5 per cent average, the highest of any student in North York.

The son of Rubin, a master electrician and Alice, an insurance broker, Feldman earned 100 per cent in chemistry, physics and three mathematics courses.

"I always knew I was good in math. Even in the primary grades I loved numbers but I only started taking chemistry and physics in Grade 11. I really didn't know I had such potential in these subjects as well. As for those few extra marks, I didn't just concentrate on maths and sciences, I also took history, family studies and business."

He says he did not spend the entire year studying. "School work comes easily to me. I do all the homework that is required and no more. I still have time for a part-time job at a movie theatre and to pursue hobbies such as stamp and coin collecting, playing sports and programming my computer."

Feldman is headed for University of Toronto (U of T) next year to study engineering science. He was awarded about $17,000 in scholarships, $10,000 of which is divided over four years, provided he keeps up a high average.

Howard Feldman

"I chose U of T because it is known for its engineering courses and I can still live at home.

"I'm not quite sure where exactly the engineering courses will lead but hopefully some type of management position in the engineering field. I'm interested in biomedical engineering and computer engineering but we do not specialize until our third year."

Challah a sweet holiday tradition

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

For many, Rosh Hashanah means the timeless New Year's services and songs, the Hebrew school snacks of honey and apple slices, and the warm, heady scent of the Indian summer that pervades family gatherings.

The theme of sweetness for the new year underscore the season, and foods like apples, raisins and pomegranates are edible symbols of the holiday.

But the most indelible food of the Jewish New Year's table is the raisin-studded egg bread or faigele. This enticing circular bread is a particularly rich rendition of the regular Sabbath challah, and its round form represents the continuity of life, while the addition of extra honey and plump raisins exemplify the holiday theme.

According to Freda Reider in The Hallah Book, the faigele's roots go back to 18th-century Ukraine. That's when some Jewish bakers used to top the holiday challah with a bird's head made of additional dough, with two raisins for eyes. Reider writes, "The symbolism of the faigele [Yiddish for little bird] is, may our sins be carried away by the bird, and may she fly with our prayers for salvation straight up to God."

Eventually the spiral challah lost its little bird of dough, but the name remains. Its "round bounteous form still symbolizes universal peace, harmony, and the full measure of prosperity for the new year," Reider writes.

Contemporary professional bakers also resist adding on the bird's head but the turban-shaped breads endure, filling Jewish bakery shelves for the two first days of the holiday, as customers pick up one bread or more as gifts, and certainly, as a centre piece for their own holiday table.

BREAD MACHINE SPECIAL NEW YEAR'S CHALLAH

1 cup cool water
1 3/8 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. sugar
2 eggs, beaten
2 yolks (beaten with whole eggs)
¼ cup honey
¼ cup vegetable oil
3½ - 3¾ cups flour (approx. 16-18 oz. total)
3 tsp. instant yeast
1 cup raisins, plumped and blotted dry

Egg Wash:

1 egg
1 yolk
Sesame seeds — optional, for sprinkling

Prepare raisins and set aside until needed.

Place water, salt, sugar, eggs, yolks, honey and oil and all but ½ cup of flour into the machine's pan in order given or in order stipulated by manufacturer.

Manually mix dough (before machine is put on) with a narrow spatula or wooden spoon handle for one to two minutes — this is a heavy, rich dough and needs a head start.

Put on dough mode or program.

Dust in additional flour as dough forms into a ball and seems wet enough to call for remaining flour. Usually it needs all of the flour but holding some back until later results in a better dough.

Add in raisins before second knead. If your machine will not allow this, complete the dough cycle, remove to a floured board and simply press the raisins in. (Note: dough may not be smooth.)

Divide dough into three sections. Braid as you would a regular braided loaf of challah. Form braid into a circle and pinch ends together.

Line a baking sheet with baking parchment and sprinkle on some cornmeal. Place braid on top. For a unique treatment, place braid in a lightly greased, cornmeal-bottomed, 10-inch springform pan. Generously brush bread with egg wash glaze. Sprinkle on sesame seeds if using.

Allow bread to rise, 30 to 40 minutes, until it is almost doubled.

Preheat oven to 375 degrees F. Bake 30-35 minutes, until crust is nicely browned.

Challahs come in all shapes and sizes

⅔ cup oil
4 eggs
3 egg yolks, extra
7-8 cups approx. unbleached all-purpose flour
1½ cups dark or yellow raisins, plumped and dried

Egg Wash Glaze

1 egg
1 egg yolk
2 tbsp. water
Sesame seeds sprinkle
Cornmeal for sprinkling

In a large mixing bowl briskly stir together the yeast, water, salt and honey. Add oil, eggs, and yolks and half of the flour. If using an electric mixer, attach dough hook and add most of the remaining flour. Knead 8-10 minutes (same amount of time by hand) until dough is soft and elastic and leaves the sides of the bowl. If it is sticky, add small amounts of flour until dough is soft but no longer sticks.

Let dough rest on a lightly floured board 10 minutes, then knead or press in raisins as evenly as possible into the dough, folding dough over raisins to "tuck" them in.

Cover dough with a damp clean tea towel and let dough rest 20 minutes. If allowing to rise overnight in the refrigerator, place in a lightly greased bowl and wrap with greased plastic. Punch down and then proceed as follows.

Press any air out of dough and divide in two, or leave whole to make one large loaf. Shape each section into a rope 12 to 14 inches long and thicker at one end. Coil, starting with the thicker end; tuck thin end under to lock. Or, you can shape a traditional challah braid by dividing dough into three sections.

Place on cornmeal-sprinkled baking sheet. Brush with egg wash and sprinkle with sesame seeds. Let rise until puffy, around 20 to 30 minutes. The bread will continue to rise in oven, so don't wait for it to double in size.

Preheat oven to 400 degrees. Bake bread 15 minutes then reduce heat to 350 degrees and bake another 20 to 30 minutes until bread is evenly browned.

Makes two medium or one large breads. Can be frozen baked or unbaked. If freezing unbaked, let bread rise slowly overnight in the fridge. Bring to room temperature before baking.

In search of the perfect pre-Yom Kippur meal

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

While I realize there is no such thing as a traditional pre-Yom Kippur meal, it has been brought to my attention that there is a heated debate raging as to what type of food you "should" eat before going into a fast.

There is the carbohydrate camp. All I hear from them is "pasta — lots of pasta or grains and bread and very, very little protein." Are these guys nuts? I'm supposed to spend the next 25 hours fasting after polishing off a hearty helping of macaroni and cheese or farfel? I think not.

On the other side of this debate are the meat mavens. Please, will somebody test my cholesterol. According to them the only thing I should be wolfing down before a fast is a side of beef with a chicken chaser.

I think I can help settle this dispute. According to the experts I consulted (three mothers, one rabbi, two professional caters and one neighbor whose sister knows Barbra Strisand's cook's mother), the best menu for going into a fast should contain "equal" helpings of protein and carbohydrates.

The other point everyone stressed was "no salt." Season with herbs and spices (nothing too hot) but stay away from any kind of salt. Drink lots of water, but avoid pop, coffee or tea.

Even though the following recipes are terrific, try not to eat too much. Overeating before a fast has a tendency to make you even hungrier than eating a normal meal.

No matter what you eat before fasting, all bets are off when it comes to what's best for breaking the fast — everything works.

CHICKEN AND HEARTS OF PALM

8 chicken breast halves, skinned and boned
1 14 oz. can hearts of palm
Onion powder
White pepper
Salt, optional
3 tbsp. margarine, melted

Sauce
3 egg whites
¼ tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. white pepper
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 cup margarine

Preheat oven to 400. Flatten chicken breasts and wrap each breast around a heart of palm. Secure with a toothpick. Arrange the breasts in a 9x13 glass baking dish and brush with the melted margarine. Sprinkle with onion powder, pepper and salt. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes, basting once at about 15 minutes.

Place egg whites, salt, white pepper and lemon juice in a blender. Heat margarine to bubbling point. Turn blender on to medium speed and slowly drizzle hot margarine into mixture. Pour over chicken just before serving. Note: chicken may be prepared one day ahead, covered and refrigerated. Sauce must be made just before serving. Serves 8.

APPLE AND WILD RICE PILAF

1 (10 oz.) pkg. kosher long grain and wild rice mix
1 medium tart red or green apple, unpeeled, cored and diced
1 carrot, shredded
¼ cup golden raisins
¼ cup loosely packed fresh parsley, minced
¼ cup toasted almonds
¼ cup margarine, melted
2 tsp. poppy seeds
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
½ tsp. cinnamon
1 tbsp. apple juice

Cook rice according to package directions. In a large bowl, combine apple, carrot, onion, raisins, parsley and almonds. Add cooked rice, toss together to blend. In a small bowl, combine margarine, poppy seeds, lemon rind, cinnamon and apple juice. Add to rice mixture, toss to combine and serve immediately or at room temperature. Serves 6, and can be doubled.

SALMON EN CROUTE

2 lbs. of salmon steaks, skinned and boned
Juice of ½ lemon
1 bunch fresh spinach
6 to 8 oz. fresh mushrooms
Mayonnaise
1 to 2 tsp. dill weed
Pepper
2 sheets kosher puff pastry dough
1 egg slightly beaten

Preheat oven to 400. Spray baking sheet with a non-stick spray and set aside. Wash and dry salmon and rub with lemon juice. Set aside. Wash and dry spinach and discard stems. Chop half the mushrooms with the spinach, season lightly with pepper. Lightly spread mayonnaise on one side of each pastry sheet, leaving a one-nch margin on all sides.

Place one pastry sheet on baking sheet, mayonnaise side up. Place spinach mixture in the centre and place the salmon on top. Sprinkle the remaining chopped mushrooms over the top and sprinkle dill over the mushrooms. Cover with remaining pastry sheet, mayonnaise side down. Crimp, seal and trim excess pastry, using it to decorate.

Make slits across the top of the dough and glaze with beaten egg. Bake 20 minutes until golden brown. Serve sliced, hot or cold. Serves 4 to 6.

Cooking with Israeli apricots.

Herod the Great enjoyed apricots and so can you

Jerusalem Dateline

Herod the Great was a man who enjoyed eating well; two thousand years ago he was famous for the quality of the feasts he served his guests.

There was no shortage of fish, lamb, vegetables and fruits in the Holy Land but Herod had a passion for apricots. His culinary complaint was that there were no apricot trees within a thousand kilometres of Jerusalem.

Herod so dearly loved this fruit that he went to enormous expense to ensure that apricots would be on hand all year round.

In the spring he imported them from Italy, in the summer from Armenia and in the winter from Algeria. In the autumn, when there were no fresh apricots anywhere in the world, he made do with jams and preserves. Over a 20-year period his various cooks devised more than 200 apricot-based recipes.

Over the years, many local beliefs have developed about these delicious fruits. Bedouin women living in the Negev Desert say that tea made from apricot pits increases fertility, the men of the Samaritan sect consider apricot juice good for longevity, and many Israelis take the gift of apricots to be a sign of the friendship.

Many recent Israeli immigrants from the Republic of Georgia consider it a sign of good luck when announcing one's engagement, for the man to give his future parents-in-law a basket of fresh apricots or, if they are out of season, a large jar of apricot preserves.

It was not until about 1,850 years after Herod's death in 4 CE that apricot trees were first planted in Israel, primarily on the kibbutzim on the shores of the Sea of Galilee and those in the Sharon Valley, where apricots have thrived.

In addition to being popular locally, either fresh, preserved or for use in cooking, Israeli apricots are so highly prized that they are now exported to 12 European and six African nations.

The following recipes, each of which is designed to serve four to eight people, will be useful even when the apricot season is over, as dried apricots may also be used in any recipe that calls for apricots.

APRICOT AND RICE SALAD

1 cup uncooked rice
1 piece of ginger, about 1 inch long, peeled, or ½ tsp. of powdered ginger
Black pepper to taste
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2-3 shallots (or greens of spring onions), chopped
½ tsp. ground coriander seeds
¼ tsp. nutmeg
About 1 tbsp. olive oil
8 apricots, pitted and halved
½ cup seedless raisins
¼ cup almonds or toasted pine nuts

Boil the rice in the usual fashion in lightly salted water together with the ginger just until the rice is tender. Drain well, remove and discard the ginger piece and, while still warm, season with black pepper to taste and then add the shallots, coriander and nutmeg. Stir in just enough olive oil to make the rice moist and then add the apricots and raisins. Garnish with the roasted almonds or pine nuts and serve warm.

APRICOT SOUFFLE

3 tbsp. each butter and flour
1 cup milk
6 tbsp. sugar
1 cup pureed cooked apricots
4 egg yolks
2 tbsp. kosher kirsch liqueur
6 egg whites
¼ tsp. salt
1 tsp. confectioners' sugar

In a large saucepan, melt the butter. To this, add the flour and cook for 3 minutes, stirring constantly, but not allowing the mixture to brown. In a separate saucepan, scald the milk together with the sugar. Pour the milk into the flour and butter, stirring briskly and then simmer for 4-5 minutes. Remove from the flame and let cool.

To the cool mixture add the apricot puree and then beat in the egg yolks, one at a time. Add the kirsch. In a separate container, combine the egg whites and salt and beat until they are stiff but not dry and then fold the egg whites into the apricot mixture.

Pour into a 6-cup, buttered and sugared souffle mold and bake in an oven that has been preheated to 400 F. for 20 minutes. Gently open the oven door, sprinkle the souffle with the confectioners' sugar and bake 8-10 minutes longer. Serve immediately.

APRICOTS IN DESSERT WINE

4 large ripe apricots, peeled, halved and sliced
1-1½ cups sweet white dessert wine
4 tsp. confectioners' sugar
Juice of 2 lemons

Distribute the appricot slices between four dessert glasses. Over each apricot, sprinkle 1 tsp. of the confectioners' sugar and squeeze the juice of ½ lemon. Cover and refrigerate. Immediately before serving, pour over just enough of the wine to cover the fruit. (Serves 4).

Holiday recipes

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOCK CHICKEN LIVER

1 can green beans, drained well
1 can sweet green peas, drained well
3 hard boiled eggs
2 onions, sliced
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 cup chopped walnuts
Salt and pepper to taste
Matzah meal

In a small skillet, heat oil. Add onions and saute until softened and just golden in color. Combine all ingredients except the matzah meal in a food processor. Using the metal blade, process until almost smooth. Remove to a bowl. Stir in enough matzah meal to give it the required texture. Taste and correct seasonings. Chill several hours or overnight. Serve with rye bread rounds or crackers.

TOMATOES PROVENCAL

6 large tomatoes, cut in half
½ cup parve margarine
1 cup chopped onion
1 clove garlic, minced
1 ¼ cups fine bread crumbs
½ cup snipped fresh parsley
2 tsp. basil
1 tsp. thyme
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground pepper

Melt margarine in a skillet; saute onion and garlic until soft. Remove pan from heat and stir in crumbs, parsley and seasonings. Mound this mixture on top of each tomato half. Compress gently with cupped palm of hand. Place the tomatoes in a shallow baking dish. Bake in a 350° oven about 20 minutes or until the filling is lightly browned and the tomatoes are tender.

HONEY GLAZED CHICKEN

½ cup soy sauce
2 tbsp. finely chopped onion
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
½ tsp. grated ginger root or ¼ teaspoon ground ginger
1 4-5 lb. whole roasting chicken
¼ cup honey
2 tbsp. soy sauce

Stir together the ½ cup soy sauce, onion, garlic, oil and ginger root. Place chicken in a plastic bag and place in a bowl. Pour the soy sauce over the chicken and close the bag. Chill for 3 hours, turning the chicken occasionally to distribute marinade. Drain. Skewer the chicken neck to back. Tie legs to tail; twist wing tips under back. Place chicken, breast side up, on a rack in a shallow roasting pan. Roast in a 375° oven 1½ hours or until drumstick moves easily. Mix ¼ cup honey with 2 tablespoons soy sauce. Baste chicken with honey-soy mixture during the last 15 minutes of roasting time. Serve with Tomatoes Provencal.

Jewish cooking has evolved over the ages

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Quick, now. What's your definition of "Jewish food?" Bagels and cream cheese? Gefilte fish? Chopped liver? Sambusak? Chicken, lime and Tortilla soup?

What?

The truth is, of course, that there is no such thing as truly "Jewish" food. Jews, wherever they ended up in their centuries of travelling, adapted local culinary techniques and tastes to traditional foods and the strictures of kashruth.

My Russian grandmother made kokleten, while my Canadian-raised mother made hamburgers; my Austrian grandmother served kale, while her daughters preferred cabbage.

And I like spaghetti and meat sauce and Chinese stir-fry.

My children, I have no doubt, will experiment with Martian salads and deep-space stew.

What brought on this reverie, was two cookbooks that I came across, In Search of Plenty, by Oden Schwartz (published in Canada by Culture Concepts, 1994) and Jewish Cooking in America, by Joan Nathan (Knopf, 1994).

Both are fascinating discussions of the evolution of Jewish cooking through the years.

Over half of In Search of Plenty is, pure and simple, a history of Jewish foods and cooking, from biblical times, through the various countries of the Diaspora, to modern-day Israel.

Schwartz gives the reader an insight into what the Jewish kitchen was like, the importance of culinary traditions in the preservation of Jewish culture and the evolution of what we consider our own food history.

The recipes are heavily traditional Ashkenazi and Sephardi dishes, with such delights as fish in tahina sauce, pumpkin cooked in rice, and pot roast with potatoes and garlic.

Nathan's book deals with the different groups of Jews who settled in the United States, and is laced with delightful anecdotes, information about early cookbooks, cooks and restaurants, and eating styles.

Photographs add both interest and historical insight, as do frequent quotes from letters, books and newspapers.

The beleaguered kosher cook of today will get a kick out of an account from The American Hebrew of April 15, 1910, that talks about a strike by Jewish housewives, when chuck steak, a staple in Jewish homes of the time (and often now, too) went from 16 cents a pound to an unconscionable 20 and 22 cents a pound.

Nathan describes with some relish how such ethnic delicacies as Mexican seviche, pastel de papa from Argentina (a potato-meat pie) and salmon mousse were translated into kosher delicacies.

There is an almost poignant recognition of the adaptations the new Jewish immigrants had to make to new foods, the often scanty availability of kosher products and their own poverty.

FISH IN TAHINA SAUCE
(From In Search of Plenty)

6 cleaned fish
Spiced but not salted flour for dipping

Sauce

½ cup tahina paste
juice of 2 or more lemons
⅔ - ¾ cup milk
3 - 4 tbsp. parsley, chopped

Evolution of Jewish cooking

3 - 4 tbsp. dill or fennel leaves, chopped
1 clove garlic, crushed and mashed with a little salt (opt.)
salt
chopped parsley, pine nuts and lemon wedges for garnish

Make the sauce by mixing the tahina paste with lemon and milk until it has the consistency of single cream. Add the chopped herbs and garlic and mix well.

Coat the fish with flour. Either grill or fry until it is almost done. Transfer to a baking dish and cover with tahina sauce. Bake in a hot, 425 oven for 15 minutes, or until the sauce bubbles and begins to brown. Serve hot or at room temperature garnished with chopped parsley, fried pine nuts and lemon wedges.

ROSH HASHANAH POTLUCK WITH LENTIL, CHICK-PEA, RED PEPPER, AND BROCCOLI SALAD

(From Jewish Cooking in America)

Salad
1 lb. broccoli
2 cups chick-peas (1 12-ounce can)
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. fresh parsley
¼ cup olive oil
1 garlic clove, mashed
Salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
2 cups lentils
2 red peppers

Vinaigrette
2 tbsp. kosher balsamic vinegar
1 garlic clove, mashed
Dash of sugar
1 tsp. kosher French mustard
¼ cup olive oil
¼ cup fresh mint

Cut the broccoli into florets, cook briefly in boiling salted water, and plunge into iced water.

Drain the chick-peas and mix with the lemon juice, parsley, ¼ cup olive oil, garlic clove, and salt and pepper. Set aside.

Clean the lentils and cook in boiling salted water for about 20 minutes or until al dente. Drain.

Place the red peppers in a preheated 450-degree oven for 20 minutes. When charred, place immediately in a brown paper bag to cool down for about 30 minutes. Peel, remove seeds and membranes, and slice into thin strips about ½ inch wide.

To make the vinaigrette mix the balsamic vinegar, garlic clove, sugar, and mustard in a small bowl. Whisking constantly, pour in ¼ cup of oil. Add the salt and pepper to taste and garnish with diced fresh mint. Set aside in an attractive small bowl.

Using a large platter place all the vegetables and grains in individual sections, using lettuce as a garnish. Serve as a salad or first course, with the vinaigrette in a bowl with a spoon on the side.

Yield: at least 12 servings.

LUBYEH (SYRIAN BLACK-EYED PEAS WITH VEAL)

(From Jewish Cooking in America)

1 onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
½ lb. veal stew meat, cut into one-inch-square cubes
2 cups water
1 cup black-eyed peas, which have been soaked overnight in water to cover
1 tsp. salt or to taste
1/8 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. allspice
½ tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. tomato paste

In a heavy skillet with a cover saute the onions and garlic lightly in the oil.

Add the cubed veal and brown briefly. Add 1½ cups of the water, cover, and simmer slowly for 20 minutes.

Meanwhile, drain and simmer the black-eyed peas in water to cover for 20 minutes. Drain and add the peas, salt, pepper, spices, tomato paste, and the remaining ½ cup water to the veal mixture. Cover and cook over low heat for 1 hour or until the peas and veal are tender. If the stew dries out, add a little more water. Serve warm.

Yield: 8 servings.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

A Discovery Of Strangers by Rudy Wiebe, Knopf Canada $27.00

About 20 years ago Rudy Wiebe's The Temptations of Big Bear — the best known and most admired of his seven novels and the 1973 Governor General's Award for Fiction — presented readers with a colorful segment of Canadian history from 1876 to 1888. The protagonist of the book, Chief Big Bear of the Cree, is a tragic figure, caught between waning power and spiritual integrity. In the end he can neither save his people or himself.

A Discovery of Strangers is a fictionalized account of the first of three ill-fated expeditions by English explorer John Franklin in search of the elusive Northwest Passage. On his third expedition he and a crew of more than 100 perished after their ships became ice-bound. A 12-year rescue operation proved futile but kept much of England in a state of feverish excitement.

At the head of Wiebe's new novel is the encounter between members of Franklin's crew and the Yellowknife Dente Indians as well as the emotional fallout that results from a romance between a 15-year-old native girl dubbed "Greenstockings" and Lt. Robin Hood, a Royal Navy midshipman and the expedition's artist.

Hood doesn't live to see the birth of his daughter. In 1821, short of food and trapped by the early winter ice, he dies with a group of others in an attempt to reach a band of friendly nomadic Indians 450 kilometres to the south.

In his search for authenticity the author spent 10 years in painstaking research, making long journeys by foot and canoe to Northern Canada and the Arctic.

In the first portion of the book the animals of the region and their feral emotions are described. "Instantly the caribou along the edge nearest the charge exploded into flying snow. And their flight spread like a quick river bursting thick and strong into the herd . . . they knew they could outrun any wolf, the tight, hot closeness of their boned bodies beginning to stretch every intricacy of muscle into familiar speed, all their perfect hoofs reaching, gripping and hurling their bodies away over snow or swept ice, barely touching in their immense communal vision of safety for ever awaiting them over the deepest waters of lakes, always there at the spooned tips of their ... infallible hoofs."

On a rich and broad canvas, Wiebe paints his characters with penetrating insight. Above all he is concerned with the spiritual dimension of experience — not just how things happen, but also why. Never far from his basic concerns are the themes of miscegenation, the evils of colonialism and the stark and harsh beauty of the North.

The author is a master of descriptive prose. "In a long bowl of rocks, into which wind can drive a little less snow, the canoe at last accepts a gentle fire. Small smashed pieces of it feed firelight against the cliffs, soften the roar of the rapids. A mess of rock moss and two tiny fish bowls there. The vapour drifts upwards, faint as a weed bending in the muscle of a river, and 18 men hunch together around it, try somehow to nurse warmth and smell into themselves before they can finally cup the one warm spoon they have, turn by turn, into their split and crushed mouths."

This memorable novel will add to the author's reputation as one of Canada's most gifted writers — a peerless delineator of his country's history and soul.

Saffer employs unusual idea to stress universal message

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Robert Saffer

TORONTO — Radio Man is far out — in outer space to be exact.

But this new play by Robert Saffer, 27, also has one foot in our world. The contemporary characters come back from the dead to run the last remaining AM radio station in the year 2055.

At its heart, Radio Man is about the obligation each of us have to others on this earth and to universal consciousness.

As producer Rhonda Lipstein puts it: "It is our feeling that it is not enough merely to enjoy a play. The sign of a good play is the feeling one is left with, the mighty yearning to know why you enjoyed it, not merely that you were idly entertained for an hour."

This unusual one-act play will premiere at the Summerworks drama festival in Toronto August 20, 21, 23, 25 and 27. For further information, call 699-2284.

Playwright Saffer is the son of Toronto advertising executive Morris Saffer. He worked for five years for his father's agency in TV production, overseeing 500 TV commercials in his career. Now he writes a column, Streets of Life, for a new downtown entertainment semi-monthly, The Core.

Saffer said he realized leaving the advertising business to become a playwright and newspaper writer was heading into a field where the compensation is much lower, but he has no regrets.

His mother, Barbara Freedman, brother, Davis, a research analyst and sister Rachel, a social worker, all live in Toronto.

Saffer attended a military school at Wellandport, and also attended York University and followed up with a radio and TV course at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Those involved in Radio Man include director Frank Caruso, set designer Eric Weissman, costume designer Lisa Mann and musical director Mark Holmes. Those in the cast are Thom Marriott, Suzanne Cyr, Robin Haggerty, Helder Ramos, Frank Scott, Doug Ozier, Al Polo, Marc Morgenstern and Roger Domenique.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Leah Posluns Theatre Celebrates Chai Landmark: For its 18th season beginning in October, the Leah Posluns Theatre recently announced it is offering these four plays:

• Kuni Leml, a musical comedy by Nahma Sandrow (book), Raphael Crystal (music) and Richard Engquist (lyrics). Two young lovers seek to defy an arranged marriage by a traditional Jewish father. Based on Avrom Goldfadn's farce of 1880. Previews Oct. 5. Runs Oct. 6 to 30.

• The Twilight of The Golds, by Jonathan Tolins. Fresh on the heels of its Los Angeles and New York premieres comes the Canadian premiere of this controversial and cautionary tale that touches the morality of eugenics, bigotry and familial ties. Previews Nov. 23. Runs Nov. 24 to Dec. 18.

• Broadway Bound, by Neil Simon. In this, Simon's third work in the autobiographical recreation of his journey from Brighton Beach to Biloxi to Broadway, brothers Eugene and Stanley break into the world of professional comedy writing during the 1940s. Previews March 8. Runs March 9 to April 2.

• Yiddle With A Fiddle, by Isaiah Sheffer (book & lyrics) and Abraham Ellstein (music). A lively musical tracing the journey of a poor young girl and her musician father through Poland in 1937. Based on the 1936 Yiddish movie that starred Molly Picon, the stageplay is filled with the sounds of the Big Band era. Previews April 26. Runs April 27 to May 21.

A fifth play is to be announced shortly to complete the season.

Subscription prices range from $50 to $90 for the five-play series, with single tickets starting at $17 before applicable discounts. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., North York. (416) 630-6752.

Media Watch: The August/September issue of The Beaver, a magazine dedicated to exploring Canada's history, features an article of interest to Jewish-Canadian historians. "The New Jerusalem," by Abraham Arnold, tells the story of the 1884 Jewish settlement at Moosomin, Sask. As the article documents, the settlement failed within a few years. A visitor at the site in 1892 found only the remains of a synagogue and two houses, all without doors, windows or flooring. Several Moosomin homesteaders, including members of the Lechtzier and Weidman families, later became important founders of the Jewish community in Winnipeg. The Beaver is available at Lichtman's and other magazine stands.

New Skin for the Old Ceremony: Skin is the title of Peter Himmelman's third album on the Epic label. Himmelman, who played this month at the Bottom Line in Greenwich Village, is the son-in-law of Bob Dylan, the reigning rock-poet of the post-beat generation. Since a memorable encounter years ago with the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Schneerson, Himmelman is also an Orthodox Jew whose music is infused, in a generic sort of way, with his spiritual values.

Wedding Photography: The Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery is seeking culturally diverse, candid, formal and humorous wedding pictures that capture both ceremony and celebration for an exhibition, The Wedding Photograph, scheduled for Sept. 20 to Nov. 6. The gallery intends to award prizes in different categories and host an opening night, wedding-style reception, with champagne, music, cake and prizes. Photographs must be received by August 26. For entry form and guidelines, contact the gallery at: 901 Lawrence Ave. W., North York M6A 1C3. (416) 789-7011.

New Koffler program combines music, art

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Fern Lindzon

TORONTO — Music and art will be combined in an innovative Sunday afternoon series at the Koffler Gallery.

The announcement was made by Dorothy Shoichet, president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, 4588 Bathurst St. The first of the Sunday Afternoons at the Koffler with Music will take place in the Koffler Loggia Gallery from 2 to 4 p.m. on August 28.

The Koffler Loggia Gallery, situated one flight up from the main JCC registration desk and information centre, is wheel chair accessible. Please call (416) 636-2145 if this service is needed.

Funded by du Maurier Arts Ltd., this concert series will be held on the fourth Sunday of each month.

The first concert titled, Some Like It Hot . . . Some Like It Cool, will be a pot pourri of vocal and instrumental jazz featuring the piano and vocal styling of Fern Lindzon, with Laura Cesar on bass.

On Sept. 25, the Koffler Centre will celebrate with art to art. Lindzon will return to perform alone and with guitarist, Brian Katz. They will explore the many dimensions of music from classical to jazz.

On Oct. 30, the focus of the program will be Autumn in New York. The series will conclude in November with Our Jewish Spirit, with music especially for Chanukah — Yiddish, Israeli and Klezmer.

Shoichet told The CJN, "We acknowledge the support of du Maurier Arts Ltd. in funding this pilot project for the Koffler Centre of the Arts. Du Maurier understands that music and art enfold, enrich, and give meaning to life."

Gallery admission is free. The Centre would appreciate donations and suggests $2 for an individual and $5 for a family.

Buchenwald's notorious legacy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Buchenwald, the notorious German concentration camp, claimed the lives of tens of thousands of hapless victims. Miraculously, some of the inmates managed to survive the ordeal. Among them were 168 Allied airmen who were captured after their planes were shot down over Germany and France.

Their heretofore untold story is revealed in a National Film Board of Canada documentary, The Lucky Ones, which will be broadcast on CBC's Newsworld on Sept. 3 at 3 p.m.

The airmen in question were from Canada, Britain, Australia, New Zealand and the United States. They were shipped to Buchenwald from Paris on Aug. 20, 1944, the day the U.S. army liberated the French capital.

Not being treated like prisoners of war, the men were crowded into cattle cars, like Jews, and taken to Buchenwald. The Germans, we're told, considered them spies and saboteurs.

The Lucky Ones, which was filmed on location in Europe, North America, Australia and New Zealand, is based on old file footage and interviews with the survivors and their families.

Surprisingly, the survivors are quite phelgmatic as they recount their horrifying stories. No tears or heart-rending body language here. This, in fact, is the tone The Lucky Ones adopts.

Their relative lack of emotion is belied by Buchenwald's depravity. When they arrived, they saw human skeletons walking around, and immediately realized they were in a concentration camp.

Buchenwald was certainly inhospitable. Indeed, one survivor recalls the "starkness and evil of the place."

They were segregated from the rest of the prisoners, but they witnessed mass hangings and sadistic beatings. And they were clearly aware of Buchenwald's crematorium, which hungrily consumed the dead.

Their worst moment occurred shortly after an Allied air raid on a barracks which killed 300 SS men. They were sure they would be murdered, but there were no reprisals.

Back home, their families were led to believe they were missing in action.

In the autumn of 1944, they were released and transferred to PoW camps. Not a single airmen died in Buchenwald — which is why, comparatively speaking, they were fortunate.

After the war, they returned to their homes to take up the thread of their lives. They suppressed their memories of Buchenwald because their stories were hard to tell, still harder to hear and, to some, implausible.

Interestingly enough, one survivor was accused of lying because he was neither Jewish nor had tell-tale blue numbers stamped on his arm.

A little of Buchenwald rubbed off on each man. Reflecting on his incarceration, one survivor said that it gave him a healthy respect for freedom and liberty, as well as a lasting appreciation for food.

Truer words were never spoken.

The Lucky Ones was directed and produced by Michael Allder. A longer version will be shown on the Arts & Entertainment's new History Channel next April.

a collection of one-of-a-kind handcrafted wearable art and objects d'art - by Israeli Artists

Israeli Art
Dazzles Toronto

Toronto ... July, 1994.

A striking collection of one-of-a-kind wearable art and objects d'art, by Israeli artists, is introduced to Toronto, by two devoted entrepreneurs.

Judith Rosenberg, from Toronto, and Shachar Eliyahu, who runs the operation in Israel, have joined forces to introduce an exclusive collection of breathtaking wearable art, original pastels and lithographs, and finely crafted hand painted ceramics, to art connoisseurs in Canada.

The two partners met during the Gulf War and have been cultivating their cache of artists for the past year. They were able to convince such prominent Israeli artists as, Ayala Bar, Michal Negrin and Talmah Harel, to create a sparkling new collection, for the Canadian market, exlcusively for their studio.

HILL STREET BLUES

The legend continues in '94:
We're still in business, we still have our store.
Old faces and new, it's so nice to see,
The continuous growth of our jeans dynasty.

Our service the best, or so we've been told —
We cherish our customers, we treat them like gold.
Over 3000 pairs, isn't that nice,
Buy 1 pair of jeans, get the second 1/2 price!

Our Levi's and sale jeans are already so low
The above doesn't apply, or out of business we'd go!
We've covered your bottoms, we can't stop there;
Our tops are amazing, our prices are fair.

Ashley's off to Western, she's leaving our home —
Now you can actually get through on the phone!
Matthew would rather be at the gym,
He better show up for work; 'cause we're counting on him.

Forget the recession, we've got the good news —
You're going to save money at Hill Street Blues!

Learning to swim is a MUST for all children!

Tragically, too many children lost their lives this summer in drowning accidents that could have been prevented. Summer is the time for swimming and September to June is the time to learn to swim. At Frank's Swim School, we offer courses in swimming and water safety at all levels, throughout the year. If young children attend swimming lessons from September to June, that is the best way to ensure that they are safe in the water and have a good swimming foundation to build on during the summer.

Courses at Frank's Swim School are offered seven days a week year-round, with a teacher-student ratio of one to three or one to four. Liebmann says that weekly swimming lessons from Sept. to June will have the pupil swimming like a fish come summer.

The school has a superb program for mothers and infants three months and up and toddlers to 2 1/2. Liebmann teaches all of the Parent and Tot classes

At Frank's Swim School children of all ages learn to swim in a unique indoor pool designed and built by Liebmann. Located at Kodiak Crescent near Allen Road and Sheppard, it is the only one of its kind in Canada, The water level of this terraced pool gradually increases from two inches at the shallow end to five feet at the deep end.

Children learning to swim, he says, have to be able to move around. In the shallow end of his pool, they can sit, stand and walk. The water is kept at a constant 92 degrees, and the surrounding air at 94 degrees. "For little children you need warm water," Liebmann says.

Originally from Hungary, Liebmann has been teaching swimming for 40 years. He opened Frank's Swim School in 1969. More than 2,000 children take classes there each week.

The program includes Red Cross and Royal Life classes from yellow to white level, bronze medallion and bronze cross, as well as leader courses. The school has a swim team for serious swimmers. Fitness training and instruction in the techniques of competitive-style swimming are also available.

The fall session runs from Sept. 23 to Dec. 15. Following is the schedule for the rest of the year: Winter – January to March (10 weeks); Spring – April to June (12 weeks); Summer – July to August (6 weeks).

Twelve half-hour classes cost $162 (GST included) and the school offers special family rates. "We make up any number of classes because I believe, even if his or her make-ups go into the next series," Liebmann says.

To register your child for swimming classes at Frank's Swim School, please call 221-2690.

Buckstop/Shop-rite's back-to-school prices send competitors back to the drawing board

The back-to-school shopping ritual can be a cash-draining experience. New pens, pencils, pencil cases, paper, binders, briefcases . . . it all adds up. Then you get into the designer lunchboxes (I guess we really weren't hip with the clunky old "lunchbuckets" we used to shlep), designer T-shirts, sweatshirts . . . Now multiply that by four or five kids ... oy vey!

Whether your family is large or small, back to school shopping doesn't have to be an "oy vey" experience. At Buckstop, it can actually be fun! They have the chic lunchboxes. They have the hip T-shirts. They have the pens and pencils. In fact, they have every conceivable item for back to school at prices so low you'll take pleasure in shopping for them. Buckstop cheerfully guarantees that no-one will beat their prices on same-brand merchandise. While some retailers see the back to school period as an opportunity to really cash in on your need to buy essential items, Buckstop takes the opposite approach by keeping their prices rock bottom so you can save the most when you really have to buy.

Backing up their commitment with prices like 99¢ for a two-inch three-ring binder and free 200-sheet refills with every $10 purchase (details below), Buckstop also promises a bonanza on licensed merchandise. All the top names are here, including The Lion King, Power Rangers, Beauty and the Beast, Aladdin,

Licensed product blow-out

The Toronto Blue Jays, The Toronto Maple Leafs, Looney Tunes, and more. So your little and not-so-little tykes are guaranteed to look "hip" and "chic" and all those things that we weren't.

P.S.: Buckstop/Shoprite still has plenty of "adult" savings on everything from housewares to Rosh Hashanah food items, again at guaranteed lowest prices. So you can sneak in some extra savings when the little ones aren't looking.

Traditional Nursery with a "Haimishe" Atmosphere

Menorah Nursery opened its doors in 1982 and has been caring for many children in the same families since then.

Children learn Hebrew basics, stories and songs with Jewish themes and the Jewish holidays are observed. On Fridays, there is a Shabbat program.

Situated in a B'nai Brith seniors' building, the Nursery incorporates intergenerational programming by having volunteer seniors from the building spend time with the children. The Nursery holds a Passover Seder for the seniors and invites them to a Purim party.

The program also includes arts, crafts and computers. Staff work with children according to individual aptitude and encourage those with special ability. Nutritious meals and snacks are served.

To prepare children for first grade in a fun way while building self-esteem and social skills, Menorah Nursery works with the parents, schools and their teachers to make the transition smooth.

The nine staff are licensed by the Ministry of Community and Social Services. Three classrooms accommodate 48 children ages 18 months to five years. Maximum class size is 16 so that each child receives personal attention. To help parents with busy or unusual schedules, the nursery is flexible with school hours and days. Children can attend for a full or half day program.

Menorah Nursery is located at 4300 Bathurst St., 3 blocks south of Sheppard across from Earl Bales Park. Telephone 638-6910.

The Learning Lab

It is difficult to predict what the world or the job market will be like for our children. We want to educate them so they take responsibility for learning and life; we want them to think critically, make decisions and solve problems on their own. To promote these goals, Eileen Chetner has founded The Learning Lab.

Chetner, who has been teaching during th past 25 years, holds a combined Arts and Education degree. For the past seven years, she has taught Grades 7 to OAC at Havergal College, a school renowned for academic excellence and nurturing teacher-student relationships.

The Learning Lab employs collaborative learning to help parents communicate with students and teachers. There are independent programs designed for both parents and students, as well as individual and group workshops.

Students from Grades 6 through OAC will develop skills in problem solving, study and organization appropriate to their academic level (including enriched programs). The higher the level, the greater the emphasis on critical analysis and independent thought. Skills range from note taking and outlining to applying for university admission.

While students learn responsibility for developing their skills, those parents participating in the program will discover how to make the home conducive to learning, balance sincere praise with constructive criticism, and provide opportunities for higher-level thinking and decision making. The goal is both to make education an adventure, and give children an "edge" in the world of the 21st Century.

At Beatties, Continuity is the Watchword

Beatties, in business since 1951 has always specialized exclusively in men's and boys' wear. Of the two partners, Gil Taylor initially worked for the original Mr. Beattie from 1951. Bruce Hadden from 1952; they took the business over in 1972.

Beatties carries sizes 4 to 6X and 8 to 20 in boys' wear, plus a wide selection of "husky" sizes for the hard-to-fit boy; there is an equally wide range in mens' wear. For its large back-to-school trade, Beatties carries a number of school uniforms, alongside a wide selection of boys' suits, sports coats, dress shirts, dress trousers and blazers for the High Holidays. There are sweaters, overcoats and zip-in lined trench coats, as well as accessories like ties, gloves, scarves and even some shoes.

Designer and brand names are still popular, and Beatties carries Tommy Hilfiger sweaters, sport shirts and cotton trousers. Club Monaco's fleece-lined clothing is another special favorite with kids. Other popular lines are , Mexx, Columbia Sportswear, and of course that old favorite, Levis. Jeans will never go out of style.

Because Beatties does alterations, they have their own tailors on the premises. This is one aspect of their emphasis on service on treating the customer as a long-term client. This philosophy reaps its reward in success and personal satisfaction; the overwhelming majority of Beatties' business is return business, and the rest is word-of-mouth referral.

Although there is more selection and less formality in clothing than there was for earlier generations, business is, in essence, the same, says Taylor. People want quality for their money, and service as well as product. In a world where change sometimes seems hard to keep up with, Beatties has made a point of knowing where the styles are going. Continuity speaks for itself at Beatties where five of the staff have been there for as long as 14 years.

Despite being much like the traditional combined clothier and tailor business, Beatties today serves a niche market: the man or boy who wants,m not just something to wear nor even a designer label, but the personal touch.

Fantastic Computer School for the Entire Family

Upon entering the Young Einsteins facility, you need only glance around for a few seconds to realize that this is a truly remarkable place. The walls are plastered with work created by its students. In one room, you will find preschoolers learning the letters of the alphabet using the keyboard. In another room you can find a couple of 10 year old boys building a Bulletin Board System. And, just a few feet away in another room you will find the parents of these children plunging into the exciting world of WINDOWS.

At Young Einsteins Computer Education + the mandate is simple: to enable each student to develop his or her full potential by becoming computer literate and beyond. However, what makes Young Einsteins unique is its fun and stimulating environment created by the energetic staff who eat, live and breathe computers. Even with large and diverse student population, Young Einsteins successfully achieves its training objectives by focusing on individual needs from the mentally and physically challenged to genius level. Parents have commented on the marked improvement in their children's report card. The word 'can't' is simply not uttered here.

Young Einsteins offers:

- Multimedia computers, CD-ROMS and laser printers
- Children's weekly classes and summer computer camp
- Adult 3-hour training courses
- Corporate training and small business computer consulting
- Network installations
- Computer birthday parties
- March & December break programs
- FUN! FUN! FUN!

At Young Einsteins... What don't we do!

"Why isn't he talking yet?"
"What did she say? I can't understand her speech"
"My child hates to read and write!"

A Diaper Load of Savings

On May 1st, 1994, a new warehouse outlet for kids' clothes opened in Thornhill. Baby Bargoons and Diapers is the name of this unique store serving the parents, friends and family of young children from newborns to toddlers, sizes 0 to 6X. They thought of it all.

When you enter the store you are overwhelmed with the fun and enjoyable atmosphere. The walls are painted with murals of stars, moons and animals. The floors are filled with 6,000 square feet of great deals and bargains. The prices are unbelievable; and the quality, well, you'll have to see it to believe it.

Baby Bargoons and Diapers didn't stop there. At the back of the store they have designated an area just for the kids, with movies, toys and a ball room there for the playing. The kids love it, and so do the moms while they browse through the store care free. They also equipped the store with a baby change room.

If you are looking for value and savings, Baby Bargoons and Diapers is the place to go. Only at Baby Bargoons and Diapers can you buy 150 medium diapers for $22.99. As the winter stock comes in, watch for even greater savings. For a time, outfits which usually sell at $100 will retail for $30 or $40.

Baby Bargoons and Diapers is at 88 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill.

The Samurai Club

The Samurai Club teaches ten different martial arts: judo, jujitsu, taekwon-do, karate, aikido, tai chi, kung fu, Thai boxing, women's self-defence and survival (The Israelis Martial Art).

Moni, who owns and operates the club, was seven times judo and jujitsu champion in Israel, and taught these subjects to Israeli commando units. Of the 19 professional instructors, seven speak Hebrew.

Beginners are checked for overall physical prowess, co-ordination, concentration and temper, to help them choose the right form of martial art. The teaching philosophy combines fun and personal development.

The Samurai Club teaches all ages from three to 70. Four training areas operate at all times, to accommodate busy schedules. For more information call Moni at 905-771-7976.

Assessment of Childrens' Learning Potential

Soryl Schreiber Nussbaum has returned to Toronto from Jerusalem following participation in an International Workshop on innovative testing techniques for children with learning disabilities. An accomplished Psychometrician, she received a Learning Assessment Potential Device Diploma from Professor Reuven Feurstein, internationally recognized authority on children's learning potential and winner of the Israel Prize for leadership in this field. Participating in the workshop, sponsored by the Hadassah Research Institute, were psychologists, psychometrists and leading educators from over 25 countries. She mastered a number of unique assessment tools included in the Learning Potential Assessment Device, which is a dynamic assessment tool for measuring a children's ability to learn.

In her recently expanded private practice she will be utilizing her newly acquired skills together with her 18 years of broad based experience as a staff Psychometrist at the Dellcrest Children's Center in Toronto.

Her psychometric testing expertise is in measuring the learning ability level of children, targeting areas of learning disability, and the identification of children for participation in the gifted learning program of the North York Board of Education. Her professional experience also includes testing for emotional and behavioral problems which reflect on a child's school performance and learning potential. All psychometric test results are shared with parents and teachers, when appropriate. Consultation services include professional recommendations for remedial follow up, to help maximize a child's potential, by utilizing strengths to minimize weaknesses.

Soryl Schreiber Nussbaum received her undergraduate degree in Social Work at the University of Maryland, and Graduate Diploma from the University of Toronto Institute of Child Study, specializing in Assessment & Counselling. In addition to her staff position at the Toronto Dellcrest Children's Center, she has been a lecturer at the Early Childhood Education Diploma program of the Canadian Mothercraft Society, since 1984 and holds membership in a number of leading professional organizations. As a graduate of Toronto's Beth Jacob High School, married, and the mother of children attending Hebrew day schools & Yeshivas, she is sensitive to the special needs and program requirements of children attending these schools.

Roy Music Centre

Today, when children are constantly exposed to violence and drugs, parents must ensure that their child's environment includes music. Music develops character and discipline, and enhances self-confidence and creativity. It can be at once fun, uplifting, and highly intellectual. It highlights the best in one's personality, and communicates it to others. According to a 1993 study in Nature, listening to Mozart can even increase I.Q.!

Roy Music Centre is a school with a firm philosophy, developed through 27 years of teaching by director Polina Rom (B.Mus., B.Ed., M.Mus.). For Ms. Rom, constant concern for each student's wellbeing and motivation is essential. It leads to the ultimate fulfilment for a teacher, to hear a five-year-old pupil play in a concert, or seeing an advanced student win a competition.

Roy Music Centre teaches styles from classical to popular and jazz, helping students develop a kaleidoscope of knowledge and tastes. A variety of instruments are taught, as well as theory, harmony and history. Students especially enjoy the voice program, which allows them to sing popular as well as classical songs.

Ms. Rom encourages starting lessons at age three, when the child's fundamental skills begin to develop. THE KIDMUSIC program is specially designed for this age group.

Appointments for initial evaluation are free. For further information of the special offer of one month's free lessons, please call 905-881-2551 or 905-731-1717.

Maestro Brodie awarded Order of Canada

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada's maestro of the saxophone, Paul Brodie, has been awarded the coveted Order of Canada.

The medal will be presented by the Governor General of Canada, Ramon Hnatyshyn, during a formal ceremony in October at Ottawa's Rideau Hall. The Order of Canada is given to those individuals who have demonstrated outstanding service to Canada, to their fellow citizens, or to humanity at large. For Paul Brodie, the honor is richly deserved.

Brodie has come a long way from the auditoriums of Regina where he first performed, playing with the Regina Lions Junior Band many years ago. Today, his music takes him around the globe, selling out venues wherever he is the featured artist.

Since 1960, Brodie has given more than 2,500 recitals in Canada, the United States, Israel, Mexico, France and Italy. Most recently, he toured Hong Kong and the People's Republic of China where he was literally mobbed by adoring fans. He received rave reviews from the local press which dubbed him the "Marco Polo of the Saxophone."

Throughout his musical career, Brodie has taken on the additional role of unofficial ambassador of good will, spearheading the establishment of music schools in many countries. During his visit to China, Brodie offered his services in promoting that nation's fledgling saxophone clinics, providing guidance to students and teachers alike.

While in the Far East, Brodie premiered a piece composed specifically for him by Huang an-lun. His sax was the only western instrument in an orchestra of antiquated, hand-made instruments called gaohus, sanxians, shengs and suonas. Brodie says it was the first Chinese music ever to use a western instrument as a solo.

Brodie is currently on a concert swing through Scotland, which will culminate in performances at the renowned International Arts Festival in Edinburgh.

Canada's premier saxophone virtuoso is not one to consider slowing his pace. Bearded, strikingly handsome, he looks much younger than his 60 years. This September, he will be releasing his 46th recording. Entitled Back to the '20s, the album presents a wide cross-section of early 20th century music, from waltzes to ragtime.

"The album is dedicated to Rudy Wiedoeft," says Brodie. "He was the man who almost singlehandedly initiated the saxophone craze of the 1920s; who inspired me to take up the instrument as well as millions of others."

Among the songs on the album are Saxophobia, Kiss Me Again, and Kitten on the Keys.

Due to his reputation for excellence, Brodie has received tempting offers to teach outside of Canada. He always politely declines, explaining, "This is home for me and my family. It's a marvelous country with increasing opportunities for musicians. I've never felt the need to pursue employment elsewhere."

In Toronto Brodie divides his time between teaching music at York University, overseeing the Brodie School of Music and Modern Dance (at Bathurst and Eglinton), and at the end of a long day, spending some relaxing hours at his cottage in Bala, Ontario. He continues to practise on his sax almost daily, because "You never really stop learning about music," he says.

Admitting to having been flabbergasted when the call came from Ottawa in June about his being awarded the Order of Canada, he chuckles, "At first I thought it was the income tax people. I had been nominated for the award several years ago, but having heard nothing more thereafter, I eventually forgot about it."

The only saxophonist ever to be recognized for the Order of Canada, he now joins the illustrious ranks of artists already bearing the title, including Anne Murray, Moe Koffman and Oscar Peterson.

Brodie says it is the highest honor a Canadian can receive; for a musician, it represents the highest form of recognition for one's contributions and achieveents.

"It makes me especially proud as a Jewish person. Never would I have believed at my Bar Mitzvah, when I received my first instrument — a clarinet — that music would one day take me before the Governor General of Canada to have this medal bestowed on me," he says.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Jerusalem Birthday Party: At a recent press gathering, Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, announced Jerusalem is preparing for a spectacular 3,000th birthday party in 1996. "Gee," one wag remarked, "you'd never have guessed it. The city doesn't look a day over 2,500."

By 1996, it will be precisely three millennia since King David designated Jerusalem as the Jewish capital. To celebrate, planners are promising an extraordinary catalogue of festivities. Among the planned events:

- Fifteen world-renowned chefs will prepare a meal fit for a king for several thousand fortunate diners.
- Thousands of marchers will participate in an historical pageant through city streets.
- A series of world premieres in theatres, dance and music.
- City squares will reverberate with the singing of international gospel choirs, and concert halls will ring with the sounds of concerts of international calibre.
- Around town, famous artists will design floral displays of Biblical scenes.

With all the recent peace gains and an impending visit by the Pope, it seems that — dare I say it? — the stars may finally be in the right place as far as Israel's tourism picture is concerned. The planned year-long celebration, which promises to be the world's biggest municipal birthday bash, is expected to bring a record number of tourists to Jerusalem.

Israel's Ministry of Tourism is working with the private sector to ensure sufficient hotel space for 1996. Never established in Israel before, Days Inn and Marriott recently announced they are planning footholds in the Israel market.

According to Ministry of Tourism surveys, Jerusalem is the favourite destination of visitors to Israel, and the Western Wall is the number one tourist attraction.

Meet the Israeli Program: Sure, you've interacted with taxi drivers, tour guides, shopkeepers, waiters and hotel employees during your visits to Israel, but how many Israelis have you met outside the hospitality industry? Israel's Ministry of Tourism runs a program through which visitors may enjoy coffee, cake and a chat with hosting families in Jerusalem, Haifa, Tel Aviv, Eilat and Netanya.

If you wish to participate, contact the Tourist Information Office in Israel several days before the requested date of meeting to make arrangements. Hosting families are indexed according to language, profession, hobbies and other criteria. Once matched, you will be given the name, address and phone number of a host, and requested to phone directly to confirm the appointment. Groups may also utilize the program.

Phone numbers: Eilat, 059-72268 or 059-76737; Haifa, 04-666521/3; Jerusalem, 02- 241281/2; Netanya, 053-27286; Tel Aviv, 03-223266/7; Tiberias, 06-720992; Ashkelon, 051-32412. Canadian Pacific Stores: "If we can't export the scenery, we'll import the tourists." So said William Cornelius Van Horne, general director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the late 1880s, in explaining the necessity for a cross-country chain of grand hotels. More than a century later, the Canadian Pacific Hotels Corporation is the largest owner-operated hotel company in Canada. Its 26 properties across the country represent one of the largest collections of landmark, heritage hotels in the world.

Now CP has come up with a nifty place for those imported tourists to spend their money. Recently, the chain opened the Canadian Pacific Store in Toronto's Royal York Hotel, the second in its own private-label retail chain. The shop, like the one in the Banff Springs Hotel, carries many items reminiscent of the early days of Canadian travel with Canadian Pacific.

The inventory includes custom-made travel accessories, reproduction railway items, and original and reproduction silver once used in the hotels. As well, both shops carry a selection of posters and stationery featuring historic CP crests, and other private-label merchandise made expressly for CP.

"The Canadian Pacific Store reflects the heritage and elegance of our hotels," says Marilyn Harvey, the chain's general manager. "We want our guests to share in our pride and to be able to take a piece of Canadian history home with them."

Canadian Maturity and Travel Show: Billing itself as the largest senior's travel show in North America, this event, which last year attracted 47,000 visitors, features singer Frank Mills, multiple door prizes and many displays on finance, food, health, housing, lifestyles and travel. It's at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, Sept. 12 and 13, 9.30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Free shuttle buses run every 10 minutes from Toronto's Union Station.

Shooting whitewater rapids

TORONTO — Travellers in search of thrilling vacation activities should try a visit to West Virginia, long noted as a premier whitewater destination. With nearly 2,000 miles of mountin streams and rivers, the waters of the fabled Appalachians provide incredible variety for rafting enthusiasts who want to dive into the excitement of their favorite sport.

Whitewater rapids are classified according to their degree of difficulty, from Class I to VI (Niagara Falls is classified as VII). Novices can raft I to II portions of the river without a guide, while segments classified as III to V require real paddling skills or qualified leadership as provided by West Virginia's many professional outfitters.

"There are over 60 rivers that can be rafted, kayaked, and canoed in West Virginia," says William Tappé, director Canada for the United States Travel & Tourism Administration (USTTA). "There is such a wide range of classifications — from relaxing to racing — that visitors are sure to find a river suited to their skills."

The 1993 fall season on the Gauley River is sure to be a success with the release of water from Summerville Dam by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. With each release, approximately 2,500 cubic feet of water thunder through the dam each second, the perfect time to take advantage of the Gauley River's 75 Class III-V+ rapids. The first release is scheduled for the weekend of Sept. 10, and continues each weekend through to Oct. 17. The Gauley River is a short hop from Charleston's Yaeger Airport, or visitors may drive along Interstate 79 to Route 19 out of Summersville.

Other whitewater rafting rivers for the family or the adventurer include the scenic New River Gorge (Class I-V+), the Cheat River (Class III-V+), the Tygart River (Class I-V), and the Greenbrier (Class I-III), and excellent canoeing rivers include the south branch of the Potomac and the Shenandoah.

Debbie Keyser, whitewater consultant for Appalachian Wildwater, a professional outfitting company, says, "We provide everything you need — self-bailing rafts, tents, accommodations, food, and top-notch guides who have been through extensive training, to ensure safety. Of course, there is always a risk when you participate in this kind of sport, but you are more likely to break a leg downhill skiing than you are whitewater rafting." Prices can range from $60-$80 (U.S.) for a one day rafting excursion plus meals and equipment, to $80-$230 (U.S.) for a two-day excursion, including camping or hotel, deluxe dinner and all other meals, and equipment. Rates are slightly higher on weekends.

FOCUS ON PERSONAL FINANCES

THIRD IN A FOUR-PART SERIES

When the Canadian economy bit the dust in mid-1990, no one could have forecast how long nor how deep this "economic downturn" would last.

When politicians and economists finally admitted, and perhaps submitted, to the "R" word, things went from bad to worse.

Today, however, these same forecasters are using the "R" word to signify recovery and while many taxpayers wait for that recovery to trickle down, it seems to be the perfect time to address the health of personal finances.

Mired in recession for close to four years, personal finances have taken a beating and now, perhaps more than ever, it is important to talk to financial advisors, investors and tax specialists to ensure maximum results.

The CJN has enlisted the services of four professionals who hail from the world of finance to assess the finances of several families that represent a cross-section of the public.

This is the third of a four-part series. The people featured in the articles are real but their names have been changed to protect their identities.

As well, the advice given pertains only to the individuals addressed in this letter and readers are cautioned to obtain specific professional advice prior to the implementation of any of these suggestions.

By WARREN FERGUS

Warren Fergus, CA is a Senior Tax Specialist with Soberman Isenbaum & Colomby. The firm, one of the top 20 in Canada, provides clients with a full range of professional services, person to person.

Dear Sophie and Joel:

Thank you for taking the time to participate in this Canadian Jewish News series. It has been a pleasure to work with you. I hope you find the result of our discussions helpful and practical for reducing your family's overall income tax burden.

Your Current Situation:

I understand you are both in your mid-thirties and both work outside the home (Joel as a systems engineer; Sophie as a part-time health educator). Your combined gross income is approximately $60,000. You have two small children — a 4-year-old and an 18-month-old.

As we discussed, your goals are to reduce current taxes as much as possible, to plan for retirement and to provide for your children's education.

Retirement Planning:

Even though retirement may seem a long way off, the time to start planning for retirement is now. It is important to have a clear plan for reaching your goals.

From an income tax perspective, Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP) contributions are probably the best way to accumulate the savings needed for retirement. Right now you each have about $5,000 accumulated in your RRSPs. Your current year contribution limits (including RRSP room carried forward) are roughly $12,000 for Joel and $9,500 for Sophie. Although it seems difficult to put away enough money to make substantial RRSP contributions each year after paying all of your household obligations (ie., child care, mortgage, car payments etc.), with careful planning it's possible.

With roughly $40,000 of gross income, Joel will pay tax at a marginal rate of approximately 40 per cent; Sophie's tax rate will be about 26 per cent and her taxes will be reduced by child care expense deductions.

At these marginal tax rates, an $8,000 RRSP contribution by Joel would bring roughly a $3,000 tax refund. Since your car loan payments of $550 per month were finished after July of this year, you could put this money towards your RRSPs.

The car payment savings could add up to over $6,000 per year. While this amount of contribution alone would generate a $2,400 refund for Joel, if you were to borrow $2,000 to "top up" the contribution to $8,000, the $3,200 refund would repay the loan and leave $1,200 for other things.

The same thinking might be considered regarding lump sum payments against your mortgage. If you are thinking about making a lump-sum payment to your mortgage, consider using that money to make an RRSP contribution, then use the tax refund to make (albeit a smaller) lump sum mortgage payment. This is a great way to save for retirement and have the government contribute to paying down your house mortgage through tax refunds.

When making RRSP contributions, it is usually best to try and leave each spouse with an equal RRSP balance. This equalization will keep taxes as low as possible when the funds are paid out to you during retirement. In years when only one spouse contributes, some or all of the contribution can be made to a spousal RRSP plan. In deciding whether to make regular or spousal contributions, you must take into account that Joel has a company pension plan, while Sophie does not. Your RRSP accounts should be balanced so that you end up with equal retirement incomes (including the pension).

Registered Education Savings Plan:

During our discussions, you mentioned you were contributing about $45 per month ($540 per year) to a Registered Education Savings Plan (RESP) for your children's university education. These plans are similar to RRSPs, as the interest accumulates in the plan tax-free, except that for the RESP, no deduction is given for the original contributions. The theory behind these plans is that the funds will be withdrawn and taxed in the child's hands when he or she is in university. Since students usually have very low incomes and have tuition fee and other tax credits available, little or no tax is paid on the RESP funds.

These plans, however, can have significant drawbacks. Generally, the income earned in the plan cannot be returned to the contributor in the event that neither of your children attend university. The original capital contributed can be returned, but the loss of income earned can represent a significant cost. As it will likely be 15 to 20 years before one of your children is of university age, you may want to consider an alternative method of funding their education.

This is especially the case since you have RRSP contribution room available. You could choose to put the $540 per year into RRSPs instead of RESPs. In this way, the eventual withdrawal of the funds will be taxable in your hands, not your children's, but you will get a tax deduction for the contributions today. This alternative avoids the uncertainty concerning education decisions which won't likely be made for 15 years or so.

Child Care Expenses:

Because you are both employed, the costs of caring for your children are tax deductible to you as child care expenses. These expenses are limited to $5,000 per year per child under 7 years old ($3,000 if the child is over 7 but not yet 15). The child care deductions must be claimed by the lower-income spouse and cannot exceed two-thirds of that person's earned income.

Presently, you pay a babysitter $125 per week (about $6,500 per year). This amount should qualify entirely as a child care deduction. Other expenses which could qualify are the cost of pre-school.

You told me Joel's sister will be living with you while she attends university, and will be providing babysitting services. These services will be in place of the current babysitter. I understand you are considering not paying Joel's sister for the full value of the babysitting and will provide her with room and board in your home in lieu of such pay. Under this arrangement, she would not pay you for the room and board which, you have told me, has a market value of $350 per month ($2,800 for the eight-month university school year).

Rather than enter into this kind of a "barter" arrangement with Joel's sister, I believe you would each be better off if you paid her for the full value of the babysitting services and she paid you for the full value of the room and board. In this way, the babysitting costs incurred by you would qualify for tax deductions as child care expenses. The amounts would have to be reported by Joel's sister in her income, but as a university student she will be eligible for tuition and education credits and, depending on her other sources of income for the year, she will likely not have to pay much (if any) tax on the babysitting income.

The amounts you receive from her for room and board will have to be included in your income as rental income, but can be offset with expenses. Based on the roughly $2,800 to be received, you may not have any net rental income (and so, no related income tax payable) after you have deducted the proportionate amount of expenses such as realty taxes, utilities, insurance, food costs and mortgage interest.

It is important to note, however, that in order to preserve your ability to claim the principal residence exemption on the entire house when you eventually sell it, you should not claim capital cost allowance (tax depreciation) against the rental income. If it does not appear that you have a reasonable expectation of earning a profit from the rental then you may not actually claim a rental loss, but you would still be eligible to claim expenses to bring your net rental income down to zero.

Sophie's Automobile Expenses:

Sophie, in the course of your employment, you are required to drive your own vehicle. Your employer reimburses you for this use at 21 cents per kilometre. The employer should provide you with a Form T2200, setting out the conditions of your employment, especially the requirement that you use your own car for business travel.

For income tax purposes, you have the option of either including the reimbursement in your income for the year and claiming car expenses, or not reporting the reimbursement in your income, in which case you would not be allowed to claim the expenses. This decision can be made on a year by year basis and requires some calculating, but, depending on your expenses for the year and the extent of your business use, one option can result in a significant advantage over the other.

Based on your estimated business use for the year of approximately 20 per cent (travel between home and office is considered personal, not business travel) and your expenses for gasoline, maintenance and insurance (all together totaling about $3,000), I have calculated that you are eligible to claim car expenses before capital cost allowance of $600. Added to this amount is a claim for capital cost allowance based on the maximum of $24,000 (plus sales taxes, but for our purposes say $24,000) at the 30 per cent rate, for a claim of $1,440 (using the same 20 per cent business portion).

It would appear that for this year you would be better off to include the reimbursement amount in your income and claim the related car expenses. The reimbursement, based on approximately 5,000 business kilometres, totals $1,050. Your expenses total $2,040, so that you will have a net deduction, for tax purposes, of $1,010. At your current tax rate of approximately 27 per cent, this deduction should bring a $270 tax refund.

You should keep a mileage log to properly track business use of your car, along with receipts supporting your expenses. Both items may be requested by Revenue Canada to verify your claim.

Finally, let me thank you again for participating in this series. I hope this information will help you achieve your long-term objectives while saving you some tax along the way.

Yours truly
Warren Fergus, CA

A 'motivation' to do better

Useful income tax tips

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

In order to determine Joel and Sophie's assessment of their financial planning experience, The CJN conducted a follow-up interview with them.

TORONTO — When we first approached Joel and Sophie in Saskatoon with the idea of a "public" financial planning session, the timing couldn't have been better. In fact, they said this was something they had talked about doing many times.

The outcome?

"It was a little tricky to do over the phone but it was a good process to go through and it did reaffirm that what we are doing is right on track," said Sophie.

Warren's suggestion about not putting any more money into the RREP for the children is one they will follow up on. "It does make sense to put the money into our RRSPs. While we don't know if we'll do it right away, we will won't put any more money into the scholarship fund," Sophie said.

Two pointers that she feels will benefit the family include the pre-school costs and Sophie's expenses that may be used as deductions on their income tax.

"Warren also gave us good information on how to top up our RRSPs. The entire process gave us the motivation to do better."

Would she and Joel sit down with another financial expert in the future?

"Yes, but we would have to be significantly better off before we think about starting to diversify our investments."

BIZ BRIEFS

GDP Falls 5.7 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — The Gross Domestic Product (GDP) fell 5.7 per cent in the second quarter of the year, as the closure of the territories cut down construction activity and the Hebron massacre reduced tourism, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported recently.

The GDP measures the total value of goods produced and services provided by the economy.

The business product, which measures private sector activity, dropped 10.2 per cent compared with the first quarter, due to the sharp decline in construction and a relatively moderate increase in industrial production.

Despite the drop, both the GDP and the business product rose 5 per cent during the first half of the year following first quarter increases of 7.8 per cent in the GDP and 10.2 per cent in the business product.

Eli Sagi, director of Economic Models, was not surprised by the GDP drop and said his company had predicted it six months ago. He expects, however, that economic growth will moderate in the next two years.

Sagi attributes the slowdown in the economy to the virtual halt in the government's efforts to increase the economy's efficiency and to the reduced flow of immigrants. These two factors were most responsible, according to him, for the impressive growth that has been registered since the beginning of the decade.

Trade Deficit Falls

JERUSALEM — The trade deficit fell by a third last month to $410 million, as exports rose 3.6 per cent and imports dropped 8.5 per cent, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported recently.

Exports rose to $1.34 billion from $1.29 billion in June, while imports fell to $1.75 billion from $1.91 billion.

According to the bureau, the drop in imports reflected a sharp decrease in fuel imports last month.

During the first seven months of the year, the trade gap shot up 37 per cent to $4.67 billion compared with the same period last year.

Exports were 7.75 per cent higher and imports increased 16.3 per cent.

Seasonally adjusted figures for the past three months show that exports — excluding diamonds, ships and planes — rose between 4 per cent and 5 per cent compared with the previous three months.

During that period imports were flat and the trade gap fell 6 per cent.

The Fight Against Inflation

JERUSALEM — Members of the Knesset Finance Committee and economic experts both came out squarely in favor of the Bank of Israel's inflation-fighting efforts and warned that the Treasury must do its part as well.

Committee chair Gedalya Gal (Labor) promised the committee would do its bit to ensure Treasury cooperation, but asked Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel commit to keeping interest rates the same for the near future.

Constant small rate increases, Gal said, are causing inflationary expectations, which in turn cause inflation. "Reining in [inflation] is a goal of the first importance," Gal said. "If [Frenkel] will send the message that there is no need to raise rates in the near future, we will work to restrain next year's budget and the cost of labor, and to promote import liberalization."

But professors Zvi Sussman and Haim Ben-Shahar, who both testified before the committee, strongly supported Frenkel's actions.

State Revenues Increase By 12 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — — State revenues rose 12 per cent to NIS 6.1 billion last month compared with July 1993, reflecting the economy's continued expansion, State Revenues Director Yoram Gabbai reported.

During the first seven months of the year, revenues grew 14 per cent to NIS 41.8 billion.

Excluding legislative changes made throughout the year, which reduced tax collection by NIS 800 million, receipts increased 16 per cent.

Income tax revenues overshot estimates by NIS 1.5 billion from the beginning of the year, as they grew by 22 per cent.

Treasury officials now expect that until the end of the year, they will collect NIS 2 billion in taxes over their original estimates.

Company income taxes and property taxes contributed the unexpected surplus.

Arab-Israel joint venture rings true

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Few Israelis were prepared emotionally when Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat made his historic visit to the West Bank earlier this summer to establish Palestinian authority over Jericho and the Gaza Strip. For one Arab-Israeli joint venture, however, the peace treaty was already a fait accompli.

Tel Aviv-based Solan Telecommunications and Barat el-Arab in eastern Jerusalem had already agreed to provide temporary telephone, long-distance, fax and satellite services to the hordes of foreign journalists that descended upon virtually phoneless Jericho that hot July day.

Since Arafat's visit, the two companies have continued to work together to upgrade the tenuous phone links between Israelis and Palestinians.

"Telecom infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza is very poor," according to Freeman Bandak, president of Barat el-Arab and official dealer of Motorola cellular equipment in the areas now under PLO control.

Bandak's joint-venture partner, Jacob Solan, earned fame — some say notoriety — several years ago when he set up a London computer link that allows Israelis and Palestinians to make direct-dial calls to 11 Arab countries, usually without those countries' consent.

Helping journalists cover Arafat's visit was easy next to the enormous telecommunication hurdles that lie ahead for the fledgling Palestinian entity, according to officials in the region.

According to statistics provided by Bezek, Israel's state-owned telephone company, the West Bank and Gaza — with a combined population of 2.5 million people — have an average phone density of only five to six lines per 100 households. This compares to 36 lines per 100 households in Israel proper.

"Bezek serves all Arab towns and villages (in the West Bank) and runs the show," said Radwan Abu-Ayash, director of the Palestinian Broadcasting Service and the PLO's chief negotiator on telecommunications issues during peace talks with Israel.

"Now everything is connected with Bezek," added Abdel Hafiz al-Ashab, a doctor from Hebron who was recently named the PLO's minister of communications.

"We look forward to disengaging ourselves from any other outside company, but we can't at this time," he acknowledged. "On the contrary, we need to cooperate with Bezek until we have the capability to run the telephone system ourselves."

Meanwhile, the Palestinians are getting help from International Technologies Integration, a Virginia consulting firm active in the Middle East and in various Russian semi-autonomous regions.

ITI recently won a concession to build, maintain and operate the newly established Palestine Telecommunications Co., known as Patelco, in all areas under PLO control now or in the future.

"It's not a big system, and phone penetration is woefully minuscule," said Patelco's chairman, Dennis Schonacher, estimating there are only 23,500 telephone lines in the Gaza Strip and 2,000 in Jericho. "Over the next few years, we expect a lot of that to change."

Schonacher declined to say what other companies are in the consortium, or to discuss the financial details of ITI's agreement with the PLO.

He did say, however, that the Palestinians would need at least $25 million in the next 12 months to bring their phone system up to minimum international standards.

"We're using whatever was available under the Israeli system," he said. "Until things are organized and we get Palestinians trained, the Israelis will be operating the company on a short-term basis under contract. It all depends on how fast we can get qualified people on board."

ITI is no newcomer to the Middle East. In recent years, it has developed an overall communications plan for the Lebanese Defense Ministry, designed a 200,000-line central office system for the Beirut Reconstruction Authority, done consulting work for the NESMA Group in Saudi Arabia, and established joint ventures with MCI to install Earth stations in Kuwait and Syria.

For what appears to be political reasons, the Palestinian entity will not get its own country dialing code for the time being. Rather, calls to Jericho and the Gaza Strip will continue to require Israel's "972" prefix as before. That will make it nearly impossible for the area's residents to receive calls directly from family members in Jordan, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries.

Some Israelis are skeptical whether Patelco can function at all without help from Bezek.

"They have the same technology as we do, but they have too little of it," said Avi Patias, Bezek's vice president for engineering. "They don't have enough capacity in switches or transmission, and they have a long waiting list for telephones. It's impossible to get a phone in Gaza or Jericho."

Added a Bezek spokesman in Jerusalem: "We would be happy to assist the Palestinians, and we would like for many reasons to do business with them.

"But they have this feeling now that since they've accomplished a kind of independence, they have to be independent in everything," he said, adding: "It doesn't make economic sense."

Violators charged

WASHINGTON — A federal grand jury has indicted four companies for violating export regulations.

According to Eric Holder, United States attorney for the District of Columbia, the violations involved the shipping of zirconium pellets, which are used in cluster bombs, to Jordan and Greece.

The defendants, according to the charges, conspired to export 175 million zirconium pellets worth $3.5 million without acquiring a license from the State Department and by making false statements to the Commerce Department.

If convicted of all the charges for allegedly conspiring to violate the Arms Export Control Act and Export Administration Act, the companies would face $20 million in fines and possible suspension and debarment from U.S. export privileges.

The companies are Teledyne Industries Inc. of California, Extraco Ltd. of Greece, Weco Industrial Products Export GmbH of Germany and International Commerce Promotion SPRL of Belgium.

Exclusave: a savings guide

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Everyone is looking for ways to save money these days.

Three creative entrepreneurs, emigres from the former Soviet Union, have combined their artistic talents and business acumen to fill that need with Exclusave, a unique savings guide.

Exclusave is made by Diskadd Corp. The complete package includes an elegant gold savings card, a pocket directory of participating businesses, and two computer disks with detailed information on prices, maps, reviews, inventories and sample restaurant menus. Its inventors call Exclusave a "new and exciting excursion into a world of remarkable savings."

Zak Bespaly and Leon and Irina Brand formed Diskadd in 1990. Bespaly, whose family came to Canada in the 1973, had an extensive background in sales and marketing including four years as owner of a direct sales company. Leon Brand, who immigrated to Canada in 1979, was the computer expert while wife Irina contributed an artistic touch: Irina was a classical pianist who played with the Windsor Symphony after emigrating in 1980.

Choices

"We had a very definite idea of the kind of services we wanted," said Irina Brand. "The business had to be extremely useful and valuable to the consumer at a number of levels."

The Exclusave card is good for repeated use at participating businesses, while the computer software can take you on a tour of Toronto and vicinity. Four out-of-towners, as well as for Torontonians, there is in depth information on airport terminals and movie theatres.

Exclusave savings include complimentary dinners at many Toronto restaurants, complientary attraction admissions, substantial savings up to 75 per cent on hotel reservations, entertainment and recreational facilities, car rentals, currency exchange and even limousine services. Cardholders also bypass lineups at participating Toronto nightclubs.

The Exclusave program, which is designed for DOS, Windows and all IBM-compatible computers (preferably with VGA color monitor) opens the door to easy and fast access to may businesses and services. "Informed choice becomes very easy and joyable with thorough information," Irina says. Updated information can be accessed by modem.

Exclusave is available at authorized Diskadd locations. For more information or for a Diskadd demonstration, call (416) 633-2065 or write to 779 Eglinton Ave. W., Suite 11, Toronto, Ont. M5N 1E1.

This week The CJN features . . . Crawford Boys

By RUTH SCHWEITZER

TORONTO — These days independent retailers have to specialize and offer an extensive selection of merchandise if they hope to succeed.

"Retailers who are doing well have looked at a niche in the market and said, 'This is what I'm going to do and I'm not going to do anything else,' " said Paul Spiar, who, with his wife Roseanne Markens-Spiar, owns Crawford Boys, a store that specializes in boys' dresswear.

A small store with "a little bit of everything" is unlikely to survive, said Spiar, because customers like to choose from the largest selection available. Prices ought to be reasonable, too, as people want value for their money.

Spiar stressed the importance of the staff in a specialty store such as Crawford Boys.

The staff, from top to bottom, should be committed to customer service and focus on making the customer happy. "If you're not going to do that, the customer won't come back."

Salespeople should honestly enjoy the time they spend with their customers. Customers, especially kids, Spiar said, are quick to spot a disgruntled salesperson.

His clientele consists mainly of mothers accompanied by their sons age 4 and up. It is mom who does most of the shopping, he noted.

Spiar advises his sales staff to take the concerns of their young shopper seriously. "His opinion should carry as much weight as mine, his mom's or his dad's."

Even in this time of high unemployment, Spiar experiences difficulty finding both part-time and full-time salespeople. "There are a lot of people who need jobs, but not everyone is suited to retail," he said.

And those who are suited to retail do better with some products than with others.

Many people believe that selling in a retail environment is easy, but they are wrong, he said. It takes product knowledge, time, effort and patience.

In Spiar's store, it is possible for staff to spend up to two hours selling a suit and then discover the customer wants to "look around." If the salesperson shows anger or frustration at this crucial stage, the customer is unlikely to return.

Even if the customer does buy a suit somewhere else, all is not lost, providing she has had a positive experience , said Spiar. She might tell a friend or neighbor that the salesperson was pleasant and the neighbor might visit the store.

Crawford Boys used to feature both men's and boys' wear, with a small corner set aside for boys' dresswear, but Spiar and his wife found there was a demand for the dresswear.

"Gradually it started taking over more and more of the store's floor area," recalled Spiar. "We decided — a lot was at Roseanne's instigation, she's good at spotting this sort of thing — to go with [boys'] dresswear."

Markens-Spiar, who has a background in the sciences, got involved in retailing because she married a retailer. Spiar praised his wife's analytical skills, calling her a very important component of the business. "We survived the recession due to Roseanne's input into the business."

He said she considers herself an average mother — the Spiars have an 11-year-old son and a 15-year-old daughter — who shops for her kids and knows what she likes when she walks into a store.

But he feels the fact that she works from home is an asset. "I'm in the store every day, so I'm a little too close to the forest to see the trees."

This summer Crawford Boys cleared out the remainder of its stock of men's wear and camp wear.

Spiar promises his store will feature "one of the largest selections of boys' suits, sports jackets, dress pants in the city," in time for back-to-school shopping.

The newly-renovated store has a user-friendly layout for customers who prefer to look through the merchandise on their own; salespeople will be available for those who want assistance.

The store has been in the Spiar family for more than 40 years. Paul Spiar's father Mort purchased the business, which used to be known as Crawford's Men's Shop, in 1952, when it was located at Yonge and Dundas.

In 1980 Spiar bought the business from his father and nine years later moved it to Lawrence Plaza.

Ernst And Young Set Up Shop

JERUSALEM — Leaders of the international accounting giant Ernst and Young were in Jerusalem recently to formally unveil their new association with local accountancy firm Kost, Levary and Forer.

The Ernst and Young alliance with Kost, Levary and Forer formally makes the Israeli firm part of the international Ernst and Young network.

Informally, the Israeli and U.S.-based firms have been cooperating for a decade.

The firm is the second of the "Big Six" accounting companies to officially align itself with an Israeli accounting organization, following the affiliation of international firm Deloitte and Touche with Yigal Brightman, Ltd.

The rest of the "Big Six" are expected to follow suit soon.

The trend is a result of both the expansion and attractiveness of local companies and the increased ability to do business here and in the Arab world.

Ernst and Young, for example, is also established in 11 other Middle Eastern countries, employing more than 1,000 people.

Ernst and Young International CEO Michael Henning said Israeli clients of Kost, Levary and Forer will benefit from Ernst and Young's ability to help them smoothly conduct business in the 120 countries in which it maintains operations.

Within the year, he said, Ernst and Young in New York will have a Kost, Levary and Forer partner heading an Israel desk in New York and an Ernst and Young partner will be heading a U.S. desk in Tel Aviv.

A Cable Car Link Up?

JERUSALEM — American businessman Jack Blass, owner of a large investment company, has decided to invest in the establishment of a cable car which will link Safed and Tiberias.

The $115 million project will be built by German experts who have already visited the area.

The 13-kilometer cable car will have three main stations — one in the Safed artists quarter, another at Karei Deshe and the third on the shore of the Kinneret.

Blass met recently with Safed mayor, Moshe Haniya, and presented the plans for the project, which was formulated over the past year by architects, tourism advisers, engineers and other experts.

The project will include the construction of two luxury hotels.

The plan will soon be brought before the various committees for approval.

An Israel/Jordan Bank Deal

JERUSALEM — Bank Hapoalim signed a deal with the Bank of Jordan in March, whereby it will provide the Jordanian bank's branches in the territories with shekel and foreign currency banking services, Bank Hapoalim reported recently.

The services will include clearing checks, conducting foreign trade activities, and providing training to Bank of Jordan employees.

Bank of Jordan, the country's fifth largest bank, was the first Jordanian bank to open branches in these areas, and the agreement at this stage applies only to its Ramallah and Nablus and branches.

At the Bank of Jordan's request the pact was kept secret until Jordan decided that developments on the diplomatic front made publication possible.

Possible Trade Concessions

JERUSALEM — Israel is considering giving trade concessions to Jordan on exports to the territories outside of the autonomous areas, an Israeli official close to the economic talks with Jordan reported.

Economic negotiations with Jordan resumed recently at the Moriah Hotel on the Dead Sea shore.

The official said the talks were going very well, and that the Jordanians had asked for "symbolic" Israeli concessions on trade with Palestinians outside the autonomous areas. According to the official, the Israeli delegation is seriously considering agreeing to the Jordanian request.

"In light of the positive atmosphere and of the fact that we are talking about a volume of trade that doesn't pose any threat to our economy, the delegation is inclined to accept the proposal," said the official.

Israeli officials have pointed out that the Paris economic agreement with the Palestinians has, to a great extent, left trade with the autonomous areas in the hands of the Palestinians.

STREETSCAPES ALONG TORONTO'S JEWISH CORE

-BATHURST STREET-

Israel and the Diaspora:

An evolving partnership

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Some things never seem to change. Like the onset of Labor Day and the preparation for the High Holidays, autumn brings with it another seasonal rite.

As sure as leaves change color and fall, the Jewish community lifts itself from its summer doldrums and launches itself into its most feverish event of the year — the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaign.

Known simply as "campaign" to the hundreds of volunteer canvassers and UJA staffers who beat the bushes for contributions, the event is the time when the Jewish community reaches out and touches someone.

This year's goal has been set at around $40 million, a $1.9 million increase over last year's total and a sign that campaigners believe the worst of the recession may be over. With a bit of an improvement in the economy, canvassers are expecting Toronto's Jewish community (estimated at 162,000) once more to live up to their international reputation for generosity when it comes to supporting Jewish causes.

Toronto Jews outdid themselves in 1990 during the Operation Exodus campaign when they were asked to aid in the rescue and settlement of hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews. Many doubled their annual gifts — and more — with the Exodus campaign alone amassing the incredible figure of over $50 million in the three years of its existence.

Since that one-shot affair, campaign has come back down to earth with this year's $40 million goal, remarkable in itself considering that the United Way in Toronto raised $46.5 million in 1993, from a much larger population base.

In the sometimes labyrinthine world of Jewish organizational life, the names of agencies can confuse the uninitiated. Here's a primer on who the players are during campaign.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto serves as the central Jewish communal organization for Metropolitan Toronto, Mississauga, Vaughan, Markham and Richmond Hill. The UJA is its fundraising arm.

The way we are

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Supplement Editor

Just what do we mean when we talk about "community?"

Sociological theory describes it as a society within a larger society, a part of the whole, but with its own parameters and characteristics.

The Concise Oxford Dictionary defines community as an "organized political, municipal, or social body; a body of people living in the same locality;...having religion, profession, etc. in common..."

Others see a community as a collection of individuals, who, generally speaking, choose to live or interact with each other. A corollary to this view is that they choose to act together at least some of the time for the common good, for those who take no part in communal life seldom really consider themselves a full part of it.

The Toronto Jewish community is less than 150 years old, a mere child in terms of Jewish history. Yet in many ways it is a paradigm for all those Jewish communities around the world that sank roots into alien lands, flourished, and contributed so much to their hosts.

The earliest Jews came to Toronto for largely economic reasons, and, by and large, they did well. After a time, others came to escape persecution and deprevation, seeing in the "goldine medina" (even if many of them really wanted to go to the United States and saw Canada as either a stepping stone or a substitute) a chance to live safely and make a good life for their children.

Like all Jewish communities, they banded together and created religious institutions, mutual aid societies, charitable organizations. They fought the anti-Semitism and discrimination which, although more genteel then in Europe, was anti-Semitism and discrimination nonetheless.

And gradually, as life got more comfortable, they contributed more and more to the outside community, in politics, the arts, and social welfare. And when war came, they put on uniforms in percentages far out of proportion to their numbers.

Now the community has grown up. We have our own hospital, schools, institutions. We are known for our enthusiastic and generous support of Israel.

But "community" is more than institutions. It is also a composite of the people who comprise it, who are willing to work for it, who bring their own unique background and experience and talent to enrich it.

This Community Focus supplement is also a composite, highlighting the formal, institutional aspects of Toronto Jewish life — the good parts and the difficulties — but also featuring some of the very special and always interesting people who live here. It is their contributions that make Toronto the remarkable Jewish community it is.

Toronto-born author wrote his first book in Grade 7

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Ask any kid between 9 and 16 if they've read a book by Gordon Korman, and chances are they'll say yes.

What many of them do not know, however, is that the Toronto-born author wrote his first book as a Grade 7 English project.

"I sent it into Scholastic Inc.'s Toronto office, and they wanted to meet me to make sure I really wrote it," says Korman, who now lives in New York City.

His 19 books, with such titles as Radio Fifth Grade, Don't Care High, A Semester in the Life of a Garbage Bag, a series of Bruno and Boots books and the Toilet Paper Tigers, dedicated to the 1992 Blue Jays, have been such hits that they've been translated into Cantonese, Danish, French, Norwegian and Swedish. Worldwide sales are estimated at $5 million.

Korman, who recently travelled to the Toronto home of parents Charles and Bernice, said kids like his books because "kids like humor. There are so many serious books around, and I'm not saying that kids shouldn't read them, but they want to read something fun.

"Humor is a way to make kids become readers. My books don't preach. The characters are real, the stories are believable and kids have fun with the kids in the book. The events in the books can almost, but never quite, happen."

He said some of his book ideas come from real life, but most are complete fantasy, like the one for Toilet Paper Tigers. "Back when the Blue Jays were playing poorly, I said that if they ever won a world series I would write a book about baseball," Korman said. An inveterate Blue Jays and Maple Leafs fan, Korman began writing Toilet Paper Tigers in 1992, "when it was apparent there was a chance of [the Jays'] winning."

Gordon Korman

Korman maintains a hectic schedule. He travels to Toronto one week a month, where he has collaborated on a humorous poetry book with his mother, entitled The D-Poems of Jeremy Bloom, and he spends a lot of time travelling to promote his books.

"People do not realize the amount of work it takes to keep books in the public's eye. I go across Canada and the United States visiting schools, libraries, bookstores and teacher's conventions." He recently completed a tour of international schools in Taiwan, Hong Kong and Japan.

He said he would like to write an adult book one day but as yet "hasn't had an adult idea. I was close to the age of my readers when I wrote my first book [at 12] and I can still think like them. I spend so much time with kids that I stay close to the way they think. Sometimes they give me ideas and I put bits and pieces together to write come up with a book."

His newest book, Why Did the Underwear Cross the Street, is due out in the fall and he and his mother are currently working on a sequel to The D-Poems of Jeremy Bloom.

A lifelong love affair with food

By DEBBIE LIGHTSTONE
Special to The CJN

Interviewing Lillian Kaplun can definitely spoil a journalist.

There I was, in her sunny apartment near Bathurst and Eglinton, noshing on freshly-baked rogelach and sour cream coffee cake, while she explained the secret of turning out light and fluffy cakes. (Take plenty of time to cream together the butter and sugar in order to incorporate the maximun amount of air into the batter.)

Kaplun has spent four decades teaching thousands of Toronto women the arts of cooking, baking and entertaining. She recently celebrated her 85th birthday with the publication of Lillian Kaplun's Kitchen (Lester Publishing Ltd., 1994), a cookbook which compiles the most popular recipes from her lifelong love affair with food.

All the dishes your bubbie spoiled you with are here, from gefilte fish to blintzes, pot roast to apple strudel. Although the recipes are not necessarily kosher, many can be adapted for the observant cook.

Kaplun grew up in the small Ontario mining town of South Porcupine, not far from Timmins. Her father had brought the family over from Kiev in the Ukraine in the early 1900s and was sent to northern Ontario to build the railway.

From an early age she became fascinated with cooking — with a lot of encouragement from her mother.

"We were six children and my mother worked very hard. By supper time she was so tired, that when I came home from school she would ask me to prepare the meal. I started experimenting with casseroles. I used to buy magazines and get recipes from them."

She fell in love with baking and with the precision required to produce a perfect dessert.

"When you bake you're building something. You start with raw material and a cake comes out. But you've got to be accurate. When you make a soup or a salad you can be creative and put a little bit of yourself into it, but when it comes to baking you've got to know what you're doing," she said.

After she married and moved to Vancouver, Kaplun baked desserts for friends' parties, and then buns for local coffee shops. When demand for her rolls grew, she and her husband bought and operated a bun factory. That venture ended when they moved to Toronto in 1950.

In Toronto, the friends who enjoyed her desserts and who were always asking her for culinary advice suggested Kaplun teach other young women who were struggling in their kitchens.

She began giving classes in her apartment kitchen. Those soon expanded to six nights a week. In the '60s she started a cooking school in downtown Toronto and published, on her own, three cookbooks. Two of them were combined in 1987 into one volume called For The Love of Cooking and Baking.

Her mission, she says, was simple: "To see my students bake well."

In fact, some of her pupils went on to become well-known chefs.

But watching her eyes sparkle as she recalls those days, it's clear her desire was broader. She wanted to transmit to others the know-how that would enable them to cook the good food that cheers and sustains families and friends.

She tells a story from the days when her Toronto cooking school was so popular that students had to be turned away.

"One evening I was leaving and I passed a woman who was crying in the foyer. She told me her husband had kicked her out and told her to go to cooking school She was crying because the classes were full. Of course, I let her in," Kaplun said.

These days of fast food and frozen and processed meals have not compromised Kaplun's standards.

She believes in using the best quality ingredients — butter reigns supreme in her kitchen — and taking the time and care necesary to produce a delicious result.

"A few years ago a woman phoned and told me something had gone wrong with her cake. I was trying to figure it out when she mentioned it was a mix. I hung up on her!" Kaplun laughed.

She still gets calls every day, especially during Jewish holidays, from former students or people who have bought her books, who are stuck in the middle of a tricky recipe, and she cheerfully dispenses advice.

Now recovering from hip replacement surgery, she still entertains family and friends at home on a modest scale.

And after a lifetime spent in the kitchen, she still enjoys experimenting. Her eyes light up as she plans what she'll cook for her children and grandchildren the next Friday night.

"They love my coleslaw...I'll made frozen lemon torte for dessert ... and some kind of marinated chicken. I'll experiment on them!"

Cutbacks affect the elderly

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Today's economic climate and government funding cutbacks have created serious problems for the Jewish elderly and for the community agencies which provide services for them.

Numerous agencies faced with funding cutbacks have little room for developing new services, and their ability to provide subsidies for older adults is limited. The province's social contract has led to a reduction of services in most sectors of the community.

"There just is not enough money in the province to serve everyone to the level they would like," says Colleen O'Neill, the manager of public relations and communications at Senior Care, a community based, multi-service home support agency dedicated to promoting and enhancing the health, well-being and quality of life for older adults, persons with disabilities, and families involved in caregiving.

Senior Care provides a comprehensive range of programs and services to a growing constituency. The support services include Kosher Meals on Wheels, community respite, counselling and case management, housekeeping, personal care and volunteer visiting.

O'Neill says that the Integrated Homemakers Program (IHP) created by the government means "fewer hours of service but to more people." This, she explains, has led to wait lists of people requiring counselling programs.

"Senior Care is trying to develop more volunteer programs and the Senior Care Foundation is trying to raise more money to help provide more services," she says.

People, she explains, are living longer. A recent demographic study of the Jewish community of Canada indicates that 15.4 per cent of the Jewish community in Toronto are 65 years or older, compared to the general population with an average of 10.8 per cent over 65. There are 14,200 Jewish individuals between the ages of 65 and 74 and 10,625 over 75.

Between 1991 and 2011, Metro's Jewish elderly population is expected to increase by 52 per cent, with the most significant increase among those over age 85.

With an increase in two-income families, the traditional caregivers — the women — are unable to care for elderly family members. Senior Care and many other communal agencies are thus serving more physically and cognitively impaired people.

More than 2,000 people a day benefit from the in-home community, ambulatory and residential services of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, which is composed of The Jewish Home for the Aged, Baycrest Terrace, The Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre, Baycrest Hospital and Baycrest Day Care Services.

With government cuts in funding, Baycrest has explored ways to maintain its high level of services while looking for other sources of funding, such as charging for educational conferences where possible, using staff expertise and doing more fundraising.

Moshe Greengarten, vice-president of public and community affairs at Baycrest, explains their dilemma. "Because we have been innovative and at the leading edge, we've been able to attract more funding than comparable organizations. The government is now looking at the redistribution of funds in what they perceive as a more equitable approach. This will result in a standard of mediocrity at best, and at worst it will lead to a serious erosion of services."

Greengarten says, "We've been able to maintain services — no beds have been closed and we did not cut back on service." But he adds, "It is getting harder and harder and the result is that we must look more and more to the community."

The provincial government's Bill 173 calls for the establishment of Multi-Service Agencies (MSAs) in the delivery of services to older adults living in the community.

With support and encouragement from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Baycrest Centre and Senior Care have therefore agreed in principle to integrate their organizations. In the fall, they plan to submit a joint proposal for a Jewish MSA to the Metropolitan Toronto District Health Council and hope to receive approval to go forward.

The purpose of the MSA is to provide the public with easy access to a comprehensive range of long-term care services for older adults and disabled persons.

"Baycrest and Senior Care are interconnected at many levels," says Michael Scheinert, Senior Care's executive director, "but we are very separate organizations that offer a variety of different services."

Stephen W. Herbert, Baycrest president and CEO says, "Baycrest offers a continuum of care on campus but not in the community. By combining our resources with those of Senior Care, we can create a truly unique organization that provides high quality care and service in the community and on campus."

The major goal of the MSA is to reduce fragmentation of care and eliminate unnecessary bureaucratic layers between the consumer and the receipt of care. Other Jewish agencies that serve the elderly in the community will also be involved in this process.

The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, created some 20 years ago for seniors living in the community who wish to maintain their independence, serves a population of more than 3,000. It offers educational, social, recreational and cultural programs, as well as as counselling and referral services.

Esta Wall, the executive director says that the Centre's funding has been affected by cutbacks from the municipal government's Metro Community Services.

She says that with this and other cutbacks, their projected deficit has increased. Committees have also been formed to ensure the effectiveness of Betel's programs and operational efficiency.

"The staff have suffered the worst," she says. "They must do much more work in the same amount of hours or less." Staff positions at Betel have been eliminated through attrition and some staff cuts have been made.

Echoing the message of other agencies, Wall says, "This hasn't affected programs yet. We are looking for more savings and looking for additional sources of income."

Although the Toronto Jewish community has reaped the rewards of visionaries and generous individuals who created the world-acclaimed services for the elderly available here, it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to maintain their high quality of care or to provide new facilities and programs for the growing frail elderly segment of the Jewish community.

Mapping the past

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

After five seasons of mapping cemetery sections and transcribing stones, 39-year-old program analyst Howard Shidlowsky seems to know Roselawn, the large Jewish cemetery in midtown Toronto, like the proverbial palm of his hand.

On most non-rainy Sunday mornings between May and October, Shidlowsky and other volunteers from the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada meet at Roselawn to transcribe the information from its roughly 10,000 tombstones, some of which date back to the cemetery's founding in 1906.

"We just finished triple-checking the Workman's Circle section this morning," he says while strolling through a field of stones. "There are four rows of the Weber section that need to be transcribed, and we need to finish the Lubavitcher section. Then we'll be through the whole north side."

Painstakingly, Shidlowsky chalks over the face of a grave marker whose lettering has been nearly worn smooth from the elements. Then he delicately sprays water over it, and several rows of Hebrew writing magically appear, momentarily coaxed back from the verge of their own non-existence. These articulations, which he records in a notepad, will almost certainly be entirely illegible in a few more years.

About 22 organizations each administer a section of Roselawn; you can tell where the sections change, says Shidlowsky, by noticing the variations in the fence along the street. A few of these organizations have kept excellent records, but most were haphazard record-keepers at best; a few are either defunct or have lost their records in flood or fire.

The committee has had to start from scratch, taking down important information — names, dates of death, age, names of parents, places of birth and much more — from the stones.

The field work at Roselawn, which is perhaps three-quarters finished, is only the first stage of the project. A volunteer has begun keying the information into a computer data base, which may eventually be accessible to researchers seeking information on burials, via either a computer link or microfiche.

"We don't know where to put the data base," says Shidlowsky. "At the moment all our records are sitting in my hall. It would be wonderful if the Society had an office and somebody was working there all the time. Barring that, somewhere in the Jewish Federation of Toronto would be great. We don't have to be the ones looking after it."

Initially, the cemetery group wanted to transcribe every Jewish cemetery in Canada and put all the information into a central data base. Indeed, much of eastern Canada has already been done (by Raymond Whitzman of Montreal), and incomplete lists have been made for Toronto's two oldest cemeteries, on Pape and Jones Avenues in the city's east end.

Howard Shidlowsky transcribing information at Roselawn cemetery.

A monument at Roselawn to a Jewish serviceman.

Pape, a small fenced-in rectangular cemetery containing some 300 burials, predates much of the busy cityscape that now surrounds it. Established in 1849, it is Toronto's oldest Jewish cemetery and the oldest in the pre-confederate territory known as Upper Canada. The Jones Avenue cemetery, Toronto's second oldest Jewish burial ground, was established in 1883.

Several years ago, barbed wire was installed along the top of the fence at Pape to keep out intruders, and swastikas and anti-Semitic slogans had to be removed from a wall at the Jones site last winter. Vandalism, along with acid rain and natural erosion, are regarded as the enemies of the cemetery committee, and the reason its volunteers are attempting to record this historic information about Toronto's Jewish community before it is effaced from the stones.

"After we go back to Pape and Jones, then our next stop might be Lambton Cemetery," says Shidlowsky, referring to the large burial ground in west-end Toronto established about 1910 by members of the Junction synagogue. The group also intends to photograph the tombstones of one section at Roselawn — the Toronto Hebrew Benevolent Society — to test the technique.

Henry Wellisch, a Vienna-born retired draftsman and ace genealogical researcher, serves as president of the 155-member Society. He says it regularly receives requests for information on burials in Toronto Jewish cemeteries. "As long as there are people committed to doing the work, we'll continue the project," he says.

Volunteers are needed at Roselawn; knowledge of Hebrew is not essential. For further information, telephone (416) 588-2318, or write JGS of Canada, P.O. Box 446, Station A, North York, Ont. M2N 5T1.

Agencies target integrating immigrants into community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The challenge of integrating into the Jewish community the thousands of immigrants who settle in Toronto each year is being taken on by several agencies.

This is a challenge that requires a great deal of effort. More than six thousand Soviet Jews have arrived in Toronto since the floodgates opened in 1988, and about 25 families from Bosnia, 100 families from India, 100 families from Iran and about 20 people from Ethiopia have settled in the city.

Perry Romberg, Toronto executive director, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) says that in each of the high immigration years, 1991, 1992 and 1993, over 1,500 immigrants arrived from the former Soviet Union.

JIAS is actively involved in settling these newcomers when they first arrive, but Romberg says that integration into the Jewish community is a long-term venture. "Their involvement in Judaism is not that great, so we have to try to get them involved."

He says that the Jewish community faces a larger challenge than it did when settling Polish Jews because they came to Canada "imbued with Judaism. Soviet Jews arrive bereft of knowledge, and because they lack the Jewish experience, they do not have a way of automatically connecting with the larger community."

JIAS offers such services as English classes, holiday and Judaica programs and a free membership to the Jewish community Centre to recently arrived immigrants.

But, according to Romberg, "The problem is, that after the first year, these people are not part of the social service network. We have to find ways to keep them connected with the community. Our challenge is to create linkages with local, established Jews and the newcomers."

One program intent on creating these linkages is the Community Integration Program, co-sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish community Centre. Co-chaired by Marsha Slavens and Susan Goldberg, it offers such things as Family to Family and the Telephone Language Companion Program.

"Family to Family had 170 Soviet families attending Canadian seders this year and the telephone program allows Soviet Jews with knowledge of English to improve their telephone skills by talking to Canadians on the phone. We think CIP is a tremendous success. It makes the lives of Soviet immigrants more meaningful because it connects them to their Jewish roots. People seem really eager to take part in the programs," says Slavens.

Access to schools and camps

The Jewish Russian Community Centre, under the spiritual leadership of Rabbi Yoseph Zaltsman is also involved in connecting Soviet Jews with their roots. The centre offers chaplaincy services, including weddings, funerals, brit milah, baby naming and hospital visits.

It also runs a supplementary Hebrew school in two locations, is starting a day care, helps with Jewish school and camp placement, and sponsors lunch with the Rabbi at some public schools.

"We are here because Soviet Jews have never before had a Jewish education. A lot are becoming involved in Judaism and last Yom Kippur alone, we had over 5,000 people at our services," says Rabbi Zaltman.

As for Israeli immigrants in Toronto, Jeremy Cohen, senior planner at Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, says that it is difficult to tell exactly how many are here "because they come, stand on their own feet and on average distance themselves from the organized community. It is also hard to estimate because there are varying opinions on how to count Soviet Jews who come here via Israel. We have a contract with Statistics Canada to measure who is here; so we will have some statistics in the near future."

He says he would like to see greater outreach to the Israeli community but as yet "we have not sat down with a representative in order [for them] to tell us their needs. We have to find out such things as whether Israeli children are having access to Jewish schools and camps. It is important that more numbers are reached, but in order to do so, there is a need for greater organization. Right now, there is no group to represent the majority of Israelis."

Cohen says that Federation has met with the Israeli consulate as well as representatives of the Ethiopian and Iranian communities in order to find ways of identifying Jews who would like to be involved in the community.

Note: changes to COR list

The Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, has several additions and changes to the 1993 Kashruth Directory. The products and services are under the COR kashruth supervision of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth.

A new format for COR's Kashruth Directory is almost complete and will be available to the community later this fall.

New units include: Brooklyn Pizza, a new pizza restaurant located at 3028 Bathurst St.; The Chocolate Moose, which produces a variety of chocolates; and Delta Foods International, which processes maple syrup.

Great Canadian Food Products has closed its retail store on Bathurst Street but Great Canadian cheeses are still being manufactured and are available at many stores. European Noodles has changed the company name to Pasta Quistini.

Bartenura Bakery, Chopstix Restaurant and Leon's Diner are no longer in business. Hakerem Restaurant is no longer under COR supervision.

The Kashruth Council notes that it is only responsible for manufactured products that bear the COR symbol with the corresponding number.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list, or for further information on product supervision or availability, call the Kashruth Council (416) 635-9550 or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont. M2R 3V2.

Recipes supply holiday treats

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council provides kashruth and food-related information to thousands of families across Canada, the United States and as far as Israel, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the Council's executive director.

Esther Schwartz, the Council's kosher food consultant, prepares and tests the recipes.

The recipes for Rosh Hashanah and Sukkot 1994-5755 include squash soup, honey roasted capon with kasha/fruit stuffing, kreplach, colorful snow pea salad, broiled eggplant, and honey fruit cake.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list, call the Kashruth Council (416) 635-9550, or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont. M2R 3V2.

Haunting memories

By JUDITH RUBINSTEIN
Special to The CJN

As we rejoice in the strength of our community here in Toronto, it behooves us to pause for a minute and remember once-flourishing communities which are no more.

Judith Rubinstein survived the horrors of Hitler's Europe. She came here after the war, raised a family and became active in community life. She also speaks to groups about the Holocaust — especially children.

The CJN is proud to publish her memories of those days — and to remember what was lost.

When I was growing up in Hungary, we had no summer camps for children but we did have a wonderful institution called Grandma's Care.

As soon as school was over in late June, I was packed up and sent by train to Grandma's where I met cousins from other cities and we spent the summer together. We had a great time playing and helping Grandma with different chores around the house. When all the assigned work was finished, we were free to seek out our friends.

In the long hot summer afternoons, we would rather stay indoors in the cool rooms and play quietly so as not to disturb our grandparents' "siesta." They lived in a big house where the rooms had high ceilings, large windows with wooden shutters and double doors.

My favorite room was the so-called salon, which was used only on special occasions. It was a beautiful room; the ceiling was painted with a colorful floral design, and a shimmering black cast iron stove stood in the corner (it was used for heating the room in the winter).

Large pieces of upholstered furniture filled the room. I loved to cuddle up in one of the big armchairs, which had needle-point upholstery and mother-of-pearl buttons all around the edges. Many times I fell asleep in that cozy chair after we had finished telling stories to each other in the semi-darkness.

As I grew older and started to work, my visits to my grandparents got shorter and less frequent. But I always made sure that I sat in that magic chair of my childhood for a little while when I was there.

As World War II raged on, our lives took a turn for the worse, and I finally lost most of my family.

In 1945, when I returned from the forced labor camp, I had no home to return to. One of my mother's brothers had survived and he invited me to stay with him for the winter. His house stood just around the corner from our grandparents' home. He was alone and I kept house for him. On the way to the market, I had to pass the old house.

The first time I went by, I had the shock of my life! The house, that beautiful house of my childhood, was in ruins. It had no roof, windows or doors; even the wooden floors were missing. Completely abandoned, it started at me like a big question mark — what happened? Where is every-body?

I stood there paralyzed, rubbing my eyes, waiting to wake up from this bad dream.

As my eyes wandered through the open holes where once the windows had been, I noticed my treasured chair, mutilated, its covers cut to shreds, the buttons and one leg missing — a discarded lonely witness to our entire tragedy.

All my pent up emotions broke loose and I had a bitter cry over the memories of summers gone by and the loss of my previous life and family.

A kosher scout troop

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What kind of activity is it for a Jewish boy to run around in short pants and camp outside with the dirt and mosquitos and no plumbing?

It's a great activity if the boy belongs to Boy Scouts of Canada — and they don't necessarily wear short pants anymore.

Camping is recognized as a healthy and fun way to interact with the environment and everyone knows Jewish boys these days are resourceful and independent enough to cope with differing styles of bathrooms.

In Robert Engel, chair of the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting, the movement has a compelling and enthusiastic advocate.

"Kids in general like roughing it and the outdoors," Engel says, "and we don't give them enough of that. Boys like nature, and the challenge of survival in the wilderness. Well, at least wilderness compared to their rooms in Thornhill!"

Jewish boys, he says, are no different and the scout movement recognizes that. "They don't have to deny their Jewishness. They feel that."

Scouting came to Canada from its English birthplace just after the turn of the century. A Jewish troop was one of the first chartered both in Toronto and Montreal, Engel says.

In the 1920s, the 59th Toronto troop had a non-Jewish leader, "chief" Reeson, who insisted "his" boys have kosher food. He made a camp for them himself. "He felt that Jewish scouts had the right to kosher food," Engel says.

It is now accepted that Jewish scouts — and beavers, wolf cubs, Venturers and rovers — have kosher food, their own services at jamborees and scout gatherings and Jewish content in their activities.

That same gentleman who insisted on kosher food for his boys, Engel said, established Camp Tamarack, the only Jewish scout camp in Canada. It is still operating, although it is now independent of the Scouts.

In Montreal, Shaarei Hashomayim Synagogue started a scout troop between 1908 and 1910, Engel said. The synagogue and a Westmount church rib each other over whose troop was the first in the city.

That troop still operates a beaver colony and a wolf cub pack (ages 5 to 7 and 8 to 10 respectively). The 59th Toronto is no longer around, but the 47th Toronto is active at the Jewish Community Centre Bloor branch as is the 166th at Beth Tzedec.

The 5th, 7th and 3rd Thornhill troops are mixed, but have many Jewish members and leaders.

While all scouts must learn to bake bread, Engel's Jewish scouts bake challah. They are encouraged, as are scouts of all religious groups, to work at the Religion in Life program, which requires participants to know prayers, rituals, the Hebrew calendar and Jewish philosophy.

The program affords rabbis or other clergy the opportunity to become involved with scouting as religious advisors and teachers.

At the last two jamborees (major scout gatherings) Engel was made responsible for coordinating special diets, including diabetic, Muslim, Hindu, and, of course, kosher.

The Jewish Advisory Committee, which was reorganized in 1983, advises the Boy Scouts of Canada about the needs of Jewish scouts and promotes scouting in Jewish organizations as an educational tool.

Committee members include rabbis, a lawyer, a judge and community leaders from across Canada.

Engel does not deny there are no problems at all for a Jewish scout, but a real attempt is made to accomodate them.

Arbor Day, when scouts plant trees, is held on a Saturday, as is the traditional apple-selling day. Engel has arranged for Jews to celebrate these days on Sundays instead.

Engel relates with some relish that Muslim scout troops join the Jewish Arbor Day celebration, because their religious school is on Saturday. "And they know they can eat the cookies because they have the same dietary restrictions!"

Nevertheless, Peter Somers, who has been active in scouting for some years and is a former member of the Jewish Advisory Committee, says there are problems, especially for observant scouts.

"Scouting requires overnight camping. You can't go Friday night, and Shabbat ends too late in the good weather to leave Saturday night. That just leaves holiday weekends, which lessens your options considerably."

Engel is a strong believer that "for Jewish kids, the experience of a good Jewish summer camp and a good Jewish youth program are very importatnt. They can rough it, but in a Jewish way."

A survivor of Westerbork, the main transit camp in Holland, Engel said members of the youth movements "stood tall, and not just for their resistance work.

"We could pick out kids from the youth movements, like Bnei Akiva and Young Judaea." They were the ones, he said, who encouraged the inmates, and kept up a semblance of Jewish life even in the misery of the camp, he recalls.

Why Benjamin's?

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made. One is being able to talk to a funeral director who is Jewish, for the depth of understanding and the 'feel' for tradition.

Another contrast at Benjamin's is the many years' experience of staff who supervise proceedings to the minutest detail.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

Israel and the Diaspora: An evolving partnership

When it's not involved in campaign, the Federation's focus is community planning and co-ordination among a variety of local Jewish agencies. The Jewish Vocational Service, Jewish Family and Child Service and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living are only a few of the Federation's many affiliated agencies.

Usually, half the money raised by the UJA is allocated for use in Canada. That sum is split between local needs and national Jewish organizations. The Council of Jewish Federations of Canada is the forum where Canada's federated Jewish communities meet with national Jewish organizations like Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and groups providing campus services to determine how and to what extent the national organizations will be funded.

Toronto's contribution to national Jewish organizations last year totalled about $3 million.

That left about $13 million for local needs. Of that amount, $8 million went to support Jewish education, $3 million was allocated for local social and cultura services, $1.7 million went for Federation administration and programs and the remaining $325,000 was allocated for integration services.

As in past years, half of the money raised in the UJA campaign was allocated for overseas charitable purposes. The United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA) disburses the funds to the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI).

The Jewish Agency, in turn, has been mandated to use the funds to help bring Jews to Israel and to aid in their settlement. It has developed a number of programs and initiatives to do so, including youth aliyah programs, Project Renewal (which twins Diaspora and Israeli communities), and the Na'aleh 16 program that brings high school-aged Russian youngsters to Israel to complete their matriculation exams.

The Jewish Agency operates on a budget of $490 million (US), which is raised by Diaspora communities worldwide. Canada's share of JAFI's budget is second only to that of the United States, another remarkable achievement considering there are twice as many Jews in France as in Canada, and an equal number in Britain, which lags far behind Canada's totals.

About 38 per cent of the Jewish Agency budget goes to aliyah and klitah (absorption). The Agency provides airline tickets to bring olim to Israel and supplies them with an absorption "basket" that includes the basic essentials for an oleh's first year in the Jewish state.

In addition, 16.2 per cent of Agency's budget goes to youth aliyah projects, 19 per cent to rural and urban development, 13 per cent to interest and debt payments, 8 per cent to Jewish education programs and 4.3 per cent ($21.1 million US) to administration.

(Got it? Good. There's going to be a quiz on it in next week's edition of The CJN.)

In recent years, the work of fundraisers has been complicated by a number of factors. A report of a committee to investigate financial resource development (FRD), prepared for the Federation in July, outlined a number of points of concern: increased competition for the charitable dollar from other Jewish organizations, serving interests both locally and in Israel; donor fatigue; lack of co-ordination between the annual campaign and the community's $26.5 million Bequest and Endowment Fund; poor co-ordination between the fundraising campaigns of various organizations; and the inability to reach all potential donors.

High profile Israeli politicians like Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin have injected their sometimes provocative views into the debate over fundraising and allocations, arguing that the Jewish Agency has become obsolete and that an alternative organization called Beit Yisrael be established to replace the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization. Its mandate would include financing visits to Israel of Jewish teens from around the world.

Others have argued that with peace on the horizon and with Israel's economy booming, it can no longer be seen as a country requiring charity from abroad. Diaspora fundraisers, the argument continues, should make their priority programs that address the thorny issue of Jewish continuity in their own communities.

Adding to the mix is the indictment of former Jewish Agency chair Simcha Dinitz on fraud and corruption charges, tarnishing the organization's image.

Unlike past years, when fundraisers based the campaign on the need to rescue and settle Jews, or on an imminent danger facing Israel, this year's campaign has no specific theme, said Bernie Ghert, chair of the Federation. "The theme is that we still need the money," he said. "The community needs support more than ever."

Toronto is a growing community whose increasing numbers translate into greater demands on the Jewish institutions which provide services, he pointed out.

Addressing the issue of Jewish identity, Ghert said "continuity is not a subject all unto itself. What's the Federation, the UJA about [if not continuity]? Everything we do is connected in some way to continuity. We spend half of our local and national allocation on education."

Allan Reitzes, executive director of the Federation, said the solution to a shortage of funds for continuity programming is not to take money that is needed elsewhere. "I think we have to raise more money, since so much of what we do is continuity-related. . . The money is out there."

Pointing to a recent bail-out plan for the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), Ghert said the proposal to put the JCC on a sound financial footing is related to continuity as well. "For many, the JCC is their only contact with the community," he said.

Reitzes suggested that the FRD outlines a new approach to fundraising, one that integrates a variety of activities to maximize return. It also requires more attention being paid to wills and bequests and creation of special funds (such as one earmarked for continuity programs), he said.

The FRD report attempts to address one of the concerns of contributors, "to give them things to give to that they can relate to," Ghert said. "That's changing. People want a sense of involvement."

That attitude is even pervading the relationship between Diaspora fundraisers and the Jewish Agency. Those fundraisers, represented in Keren Hayesod and the United Jewish Appeal in the United States, have been partners in the Agency with the World Zionist Organization (WZO). The WZO's makeup has in past years mirrored the Israeli political landscape in the Knesset.

In recent years, the Diaspora fundraisers have raised concerns over the use of the Jewish Agency for Israeli patronage appointments and over a perceived lack of say in the organization's operations.

That has led to changes in the Agency and more professionalism among its staff, changes that were prompted by the Diaspora partners, Ghert and Reitzes said.

"The Jewish Agency has been streamlined," said Gerry Halbert, chair of the UIA. "It's gotten rid of executives and bureaucracy and [three-quarters] of the political appointees."

The Agency is becoming even more accountable for the money it receives, added Steve Ain, executive vice-president of the UIA.

Ghert, Reitzes, Halbert and Ain discount suggestions there is a conflict between demands for funds for local needs and for Israel. They describe the relationship as one of a mutually supportive partnership — one that is likely to grow on a number of fronts.

Jewish/Zionist education and the "Israeli experience" are aspects of that.

Archivist treasures 'collective memories'

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Stepping around the boxes piled waist-high on the floor, Dr. Stephen Speisman tosses the ground rules over his shoulder: no purses, no briefcases and no pens are allowed in the Ontario Jewish Archives.

These measures, explains the archives director, are to prevent damage or theft of the often fragile documents.

The archives are what Speisman describes as the "collective memory of the Jewish community in Ontario." It is where old photographs, posters and synagogue and organizational records are welcomed as precious documents and stored with care for future generations.

Speisman weaves his way through the stacks of boxes in the reading room, temporary labels fluttering in his wake. The archives have been housed in the basement of the Lipa Green Building for 11 years. The exact size of the collection is not known, but Speisman said it numbers in the millions.

Before the documents are stored in the specially-outfitted vault, they must first be cleaned and sorted. And for that Speisman and research assistant Howard Markus, the only paid staff, rely on a core of 24 volunteers.

It's dirty work. The sorters, wearing gloves and masks if they wish, check the documents for mold, insects and rodent damage. Rusty staples are replaced with brightly-colored plastic paper clips, and everything gets a gentle but thorough dusting. Siddurim are buried according to Jewish law.

It can take up to a year to sort through and catalogue one lot of donated material. "You often find that people don't know the value of what they have," says volunteer Carol Rosenthall. "Like posters that are rolled up and look like nothing but turn out to be from 1922."

Rosenthall, 57, has been coming every Wednesday morning for the past eight years to catalogue. The Wednesday group does most of the initial sorting, but Rosenthall says she has never come across "anything shocking or anything disgusting. There's just a lot of dust."

Science comes into the process as well. Speisman explains that the acid used in producing paper is highly destructive. He pulls out a page from a 1940s photo album to demonstrate. The paper crumbles in his hand.

Professional restoration can cost $100 per page. Since this comes out of the archives' limited annual budget, Speisman has found other ways to prolong the life of paper. "You can mix seltzer and milk of magnesia — a good Jewish way. It's essentially an antacid." Treated documents can last between 300 and 500 years.

Speisman opens the door to the vault. Ultraviolet filtered fluorescent light bounces off the silver Torah crowns and athletic trophies that rest on top of the shelves. The large room is part library, part Aladdin's cave.

It is also part bunker. The filing cabinets that house old photographs are lined with concrete to protect against fire and weigh 600 lbs. when empty. Speisman points out the sophisticated fire system, which sprays gas instead of water from the sprinklers. "You may as well let your documents burn otherwise," he says.

The vault is off-limits to those who use the archives — students of all levels, community organizations, the media — but Speisman is happy to show off its treasures one recent morning. He pulls a leather-bound book out of its acid-free folder and opens it. It is the account book of a Jewish-owned shipping company. The feathery handwriting records that on Sept. 12, 1912, Annie Zlataroff of 124 Spadina Ave. paid $10.30 to book passage for Shoil Sorokin. The balance, $44, was paid later.

Torontonian searches for his childhood shipmates

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Fifty years after he last saw them, Harry (Herman) Fischbach, now living in Toronto, is searching for his childhood shipmates.

Do you recognize any of these names? Herbert Ausubel; Helene Nadine Barrac; Peter Herbert Blau; Gaston Butler; Herman Fischbach; Raymonde Fride; Szimil Buroch Gaski; Helene Gorsewski; Jacques Gorsewski; Michel Gorsewski; Eveline M. Grossman; Jacqueline Grossman; Paulette Grossman; Anna Simma Kleiman; Leopold Kleiman; Eva Lazega; Fanny Lazega; Max Lazega; Fanny Lieberman; Henry Lieberman; Henry Michalowski; Yechiel Rochman; Vera Karola Ruthenburg; Georges Sahovaler; Hinko-Heinrich Strolc; Abraham Szyller; Paul Tuz; Jules Wajnryb; Francois Werber; Jacques Zamel; Nathan Zamel.

Fleeing the long arm of Hitler

In April 1943 these 35 children aged 5 to 16, all Jewish but one, were shipped out of Lisbon on a 15-day Atlantic crossing to Philadelphia aboard the neutral Portuguese liner SS Serpa Pinto. They were from Austria, Belgium, France, Germany and Eastern Europe. The majority had parents living in Spain. Desperate to save their children from Hitler's long arm, the parents sent them ahead, planning to follow at a later date.

The youngsters travelled under the aegis of European Jewish Children's Aid in cooperation with HIAS (Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society), the Jewish Colonization Association and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

Fischbach explains why he has taken so long to launch the search. On arriving to the United States, the group was brought to a reception centre in Pleasantville, N.Y., for dispersal to foster homes. "We were just children and we were sent all over," he says. "We didn't keep in touch."

The youngsters began their new lives with a mix of apprehension and optimism. Fischbach, almost 12, was welcomed in Chicago by the Bomesticks who were already grandparents. There he started to play again, to revel in freedom and understand the link between baseball and America. He also had his bar mitzvah.

But it wasn't all smooth going. "We were terribly mixed-up kids," he reflects.

Two and a half years after Fischbach's arrival, his father immigrated to Toronto and he joined him and his stepmother here. However at 17 he returned to the U.S. He did the "American thing," worked at odd jobs, saw the country, studied at City College of Los Angeles, put all that experience together and became a filmmaker.

Writing and directing for movies and television has been his life's work. In 1990, he took a leave of absence to concentrate on his first novel, using his knowledge of the film industry as its basis. As the story progressed it began to assume its own direction and the central character wriggled out from the computer to become, not quite Harry Fischbach, but a boy who arrives in the U.S. with a cluster of refugee children and tries to live the American Dream.

All of the characters are fictional, Fischbach maintains, but with each paragraph, his felt his personal memories surface. That led him to begin his search for the shipmates who share his past.

Novel targets voyage

He has gone to considerable lengths to obtain their names and as his novel draws to a close — it is almost due for publication — he is reaching out through the newspapers. Most of his former shipmates will be in the U.S. but he is hoping The CJN readers with connections outside Canada will be able to help.

To date his efforts have only located one person, Peter Blau, in Los Angeles.

However, there has been an extraordinary coincidence. When this reporter glanced through the list, a single name leapt out, Paul Tuz. A local phone call established that the Paul Tuz who heads the Better Business Bureau in Toronto was the same young boy who sailed from Lisbon on the Serpa Pinto half a century ago.

Fischbach looks to a reunion of the 35. He can be reached at this address: Mr. Harry Fischbach, 462 Brunswick Ave., Toronto, Ont., M5R 2Z5 or call (416) 924-1213.

Russian artist shines like glass

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Since he emigrated from Russia to Toronto in 1990, glass artist Alexandre Kapran has received accolades from some of the country's most prestigious cultural institutions.

Recently, Kapran was awarded a grant by the Ontario Art Council. He was selected as an exhibitor at the exclusive annual International Exhibition of Miniature Art and his glass sculpture won the top award at the Annual Canadian Beauty Juried Art Exhibition.

At the Ninth National Early American Glass Club's national glass seminar, held for the first time in Canada, Kapran was honored by the Royal Ontario Museum, where his glass creations are in ROM's permanent collection. The Canadian Council Art Book in Ottawa, which selects the best modern Canadian art, purchased one of Kapran's glass sculptures for its permanent collection.

He was chosen by Artisan '93 and Artisan '94 along with 40 Canadian artists to display his pieces. As a result, Kapran's work was included in an exhibition at the Japanese Cultural Centre last winter.

Today, Kapran's pieces can be found in private international collections, cultural centres, at fine art auctions and in quality stores on Queen Street and in Yorkville.

The meticulous details in Kapran's functional and non-functional glass sculptures, which include perfume bottles, paperweights, candlesticks, vases, wine glasses, lamps and jewelry, are created by his flame-working technology. Each ornate piece is an original.

The Russian emigre and his twin brother were born in Mishuckov, a remote village 1,500 km north of St. Petersburg (formerly Leningrad). His mother was a philologist who taught Spanish and German. His father was a navy officer.

Kapran recalls that as a child, his family lived an ideal life, deeply immersed in nature — fishing, berry picking, skiing and climbing rocky hills. It was so crime-free, he recalled, "that I used to believe that doors had to be locked to keep the dogs out."

Glass artist Alexandre Kapran working in his studio.

Although he had many inventions and published articles to his credit, in 1982, after much soul searching, he switched careers and went to work as a commercial artist. He apprenticed with a glassmaker and after seven months his glass sculptures were displayed at the Regional Exhibition of Applied Arts.

Married in 1986 to a musicologist, the Kaprans had a daughter, Barbara, the following year. When Alexandre and Irina Kapran left Russia in 1990, they had two suitcases and $425. He told The CJN that "the first few months in Toronto were the hardest." He got a job as a window cleaner, while his wife worked in a donut store and gave piano lessons.

Soon Alexandre took the leap into fulltime glassmaking after renting a small downtown studio. He described this time as "a painful period of adaptation," as he began working with unfamiliar equipment and glass different than in Russia. "It is the same as to switch from piano to violin," he said.

New technology, supplies and marketing did not stop Alexandre. "You could say I had no choice," he joked. To create extremely complex designs, he prefers to work with North Star's corosilicate glass from the United States.

Before long, his pieces were accepted in fine galleries, public craft shows and The Royal Ontario Museum's gift shop. The list grew rapidly to include the Art Gallery of Ontario, The McMichael Canadian Collection and The Guild Shop. By 1992, his glass art pieces were being sold at auctions among those of famous European glassmakers such as Rene Lalique and E. Galle.

Today, Irina is affiliated with the Royal Conservatory of Music and Alexandre proudly notes that the average mark of her students is 96, "much higher than among other students." Barbara, now 7, is in a French immersion program and is fluent in three languages.

"We are happy here in Canada," Alexandre said. "We work hard and that's the base of our optimism. We are lucky to meet good friends from all over the world and we are looking forward to know more about this beautiful country, its people and nature."

Summer is one of Alexandre Kapran's exquisite glass sculptures.

Paint flowers as a gift for his mother

During the long winter nights, his father spent his spare time painting and he taught his son the basics of fine arts and art history. Since real flowers were not available in the winter, Alexandre and his father would paint flowers as a gift for his mother.

"I always enjoyed crafts — all kinds — metal casting and wood carving — and even embroidery." At 12, and living in Murmansk, he began taking professional fine art lessons. He was accepted at a high school in Leningrad that specialized in physics, mathematics and chemistry. He graduated in engineering in 1977 at the Leningrad Polytechnic Institute and received a master's degree in metallurgy.

The Murray House catering hall on Steeles Avenue, just west of Bathurst Street.

Trace the history of one of Toronto's first kosher halls

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Jack and Dora Arons

When Dora Arons died just before Passover at age 94, a piece of Toronto history died with her.

Arons and her husband Jack, who died over two years ago at age 98, were the founders of the Murray House, one of the first large kosher catering halls in Toronto.

Daughter Lorraine Himmel, who worked in the family business along with her husband Aubie and sister Peggy Silver, credits her mother with being the driving force behind the Murray House.

"She insisted on high standards, reasonable prices and complete honesty. Her word was law and she never backed out of a deal," Himmel said.

The Murray House's success story began quite simply around 1937, when Dora Arons made some sandwiches for her husband's Knights of Pythias Lodge. The sandwiches made such an impression that the Arons began getting more requests to provide food for the lodge and local events. Using their Murray Street home as a base, they branched out into simple full course kosher meals, with the specialty being a 65 cent dinner featuring baked white fish in soya sauce.

Within five years, the Arons outgrew their workspace and moved to Beverley Street, where they were able to cater bigger functions and small wedding parties.

In 1962, they were bursting at the seams once more. "After much consideration we bought 6½ acres of land on Steeles Avenue West, just west of Bathurst. Everyone said we were crazy, but it was the only place we could get land big enough for the type of hall we wanted as well as space for plenty of parking," Aubie Himmel said.

The $1.25-million structure, which seated up to 1,000 people for dinner, was a simple single storey building with a magnificent, circular, azure blue rotunda which joined the gleaming, off-white main building. The dining room had draped archways, circular wells in the ceiling, and imported Italian gold-and-crystal chandeliers. Below the dining room, in the basement, was a private chapel.

The Arons continued serving quality food and customers flocked up north for their affairs. A favorite dish was standing ribs of beef, always carved in the dining room, quite often with spectacular showmanship.

The ribs of beef were placed on a stainless steel platter set over a Sterno heater set up high so flames flared around the platter's edge. Lights in the dining roon were dimmed as chefs marched slowly into the room. When the tables were set with red tablecloths accented with yellow and blue floral centrepieces, the color scheme echoed the tones of the leaping flames.

"The family was there every day, for every affair. My wife greeted everyone at the door and our customers knew we had high standards, good food and reasonable prices," Himmel said.

Himmel, who is now catering chair at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagagoue, praised his mother-in-law for being family oriented and always giving to charity. "Every year she would make Passover boxes for needy families and she often did dinners and gave the money to charities. She taught us to be honest and hospitable. The staff sat down for dinner with the bosses and university students studied while they checked coats."

He said the hall filled a void for people who did not belong to a synagogue. "We were the first kosher hall in which people could make a simchah without belonging to a shul and we were busy catering affairs every night. It really was a Toronto institution."

We couldn't find a better business. We were always making a simchah and entertaining people, but it was a tiring business and we needed a rest, so on July 1, 1974, we closed up. My father-in-law, at age 80, worked until the last day. We closed because when you are tired, you are not being fair to the customers."

Long-ago meetings documented

Rosenthall says she once pulled out this book during a tour she was leading. The page fell open and she read her grandfather's name, Moishe Faltman, who was sponsoring his family's passage from Poland in 1911. "I really flipped," she says. "I was very excited. It was completely by accident that I found this out."

But there are no surprises in the vault for Speisman. He seems to know just about every piece of material in the room, pointing out a marble slab from Pontipool, Ont.; the frayed blueprints of Toronto's first Jewish architect, Benjamin Brown; a candy machine brought from Poland in the 1920s that cranks out peanut-shaped toffees. What he cannot point to, he talks about.

"I would love to have the records from a small-town feed store — where the Jewish owners got their stock, how the orders were placed, did they travel into the cities to look at stock," he says. "These are the elements of social history you can get from looking at financial records."

Equally valuable are minutes of long-ago Jewish organization meetings, programs from Yiddish theatrical productions, benevolent society membership lists, account books and flyers for meetings — "things that most people would have thrown out." Under certain conditions, major donations to the archives are tax-deductible.

Pearl Adler Saban knows how exciting it is to find new treasures. Saban, 32, has been cataloguing archival material one night a month since 1983. Last month, she came across a 1949 file from Jewish Immigrant Aid Services that detailed her father's wartime experiences, information he had never shared with her.

"It was completely by chance," she says. "All these years I had wondered if I would ever come across the name Adler, and here I did."

Saban says the work can be saddening too. The post-war JIAS files were particularly hard to go through, she says, because the applicants were almost always the only family member to survive the Holocaust. "That hits me every time."

Saban calls her cataloguing work "a privilege." Speisman says it can also be boring. "It's not the kind of work that appeals to everybody." At the same time, there are 80 people around the province always on the lookout for new material, he says. "You have to know the community to know how to find the material, most of which is in private hands."

The Ontario Jewish Archives is sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. To use the archives, or to donate material, contact Dr. Stephen Speisman at (416) 635-2883, ext. 170.

As the Jewish Agency becomes more responsive to Diaspora needs, it appears it is addressing Beilin's suggestion for Jewish youth.

The Agency is "trying to strategize how to bring more young people, particularly those without a formal Jewish education, to [create] some attachment to Israel and Judaism," Ain said.

"The Israel experience can open a kid's eyes."

"This has to be a greater priority for the Agency," Halbert said. "The Agency is assembling a mega fund for the Israel experience. This is not backpacking. It means you're going on an organized visit."

Israel and the Diaspora fundraisers will work in partnership on the program. The UIA's role will be to help get the youth to Israel and the Israelis will set up the local programs, Halbert said.

The program may one day involve 50,000 teens at a cost of $3,000 each for a total of $150 million, Ain suggested.

Halbert acknowledged that "most major givers are aware of the buzzword of continuity. When they look to their own families, they wonder if they're doing the right thing. They want to do the right thing and so we must spend more time with them to let them know the true story about what's needed in Israel," Halbert said.

There is room for greater Diaspora/Israel partnership on other fronts, he continued. "It used to be we funnelled and they spent. But because of peace and because Israel is strong, there's been a change of priorities. We're looking for better teachers, better able to educate the children here on Judaism and Israel.

"We feel [the partnership] between Israel and the Diaspora will save the Jewish people," he added.

Despite the perception that the situation in Israel is improving dramatically, the country still needs the help of Diaspora Jews, Ain said. "If you look at the United States, does that mean they don't have homeless, that they don't need philanthropy?"

While some Israelis may suggest Israel does not need charity from abroad, "if you talk to the people who benefit, you get a different story," Reitzes said. "People in Project Renewal towns are telling us they need the money."

There are Israelis who resent any implication that the country is a charity case requiring assistance from abroad.

"Years ago, when people gave, Israel was a charity case. But now, after 47 years, it's clear we're not a charity case," said Alexander Bligh, a visiting professor of history at York University.

Contributions from abroad to Israel amount to only one-half of one per cent of the country's budget, Bligh said. Nevertheless, "this is the link, the way the commitment is presented."

Other Israelis suggest it is time for another approach to Diaspora support for Israel. Israel, they say, should be viewed as a good place for investment.

Israel does not need Diaspora favors, said one Israeli who monitors the relationship closely. But Canadian Jews for years have seen Israel as a poor country, a society under threat of destruction which required the support of its friends, he said.

Business people with the wherewithal to invest in the Jewish state were dissuaded from doing so by reports of a "terrible bureaucracy" that made foreign investors feel unwelcome, he added. Much of that has changed and it's time that Canadian perceptions changed too, he added.

Recognizing that the Mideast reality has undergone a sea change in recent years, the Federation has established its own economic development committee, chaired by investment counsellor Geoff Pearlstein.

The committee's goal is to help create two-way trade between Canada and Israel.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange experienced a boom from 1992-93, attracting the attention of foreign investors, he said. Though the market cooled off in the first half of 1994, Israel is now seen by many as a lucrative place to do business.

Sophisticated investors looking for offshore content in their RRSP plans are also beginning to consider Israeli stocks, Pearlstein said.

"Right now the view of Israel as an investment opportunity is still in its embryonic stage. But that could change in two or three years."

Recognizing that the economic climate in Israel is improving, "Standard and Poor's have upped Israel's credit rating to BBB plus to A minus," said Larry Waller, executive director of Israeli Bonds for Ontario.

This has allowed Bonds to compete with other securities in the marketplace. Where once Bonds, which paid only four per cent, were seen as a "quasi-charity," now those investing over $3,000 can receive eight per cent, Waller said.

As a result, the market for Bonds is expanding. Recently, the Bank of Nova Scotia and the Bank of Montreal both added Israel Bonds to their own portfolios, Waller said.

Israel is using the Bonds to raise money for a huge infrastructure program. "Over time, we will make people aware that we're not tzedakah," Waller said.

While the UJA campaign has become an anticipated part of Jewish life in the autumn, changing realities are leading campaign in new directions:

- dedicated giving, which links a contributor with a particular project, like Canada Centre in Metulla, could be a trend for the future.
- an "Israeli experience" in which an increasing number of youth from Canada and the rest of the Diaspora visit the Jewish state is becoming an important part of programming agenda and a selling point for fundraisers.
- increasing domestic need for funds will be addressed not by switching money that would otherwise be earmarked for overseas, but by finding new sources of income domestically.
- Israel is being increasingly seen as not simply a recipient of tzedakah but also as an attractive investment opportunity where handsome profits can be made.

Despite the changing relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, one important factor remains constant. Both still view their relationship as a partnership, each helping the other solve their problems. While the specifics of the relationship may change, that partnership will be with us for a long time to come.

Canadian observers may head to Gaza

Israel, PLO make request

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Israel and the PLO have approached Canada to contribute to a team of 400 temporary civilian observers in Gaza.

The monitors will be part of an international group watching for compliance with non-military aspects of the peace accord. Australia, Finland, Norway, Turkey and representatives of the European Union are also expected to take part.

Canada "will be awaiting a formal invitation from Israel and the Palestinians once they have fleshed out details of the nature and mandate of this monitoring force," Foreign Affairs Ministry spokesman Rodney Moore told The CJN last Friday.

Following talks last Wednesday in Alexandria, the PLO and Israel agreed to deploy the observers in Gaza, but nothing has been made official. Each country is expected to underwrite the costs of its observers.

Moore said Canada has simply been "approached" with the request for observers, and he could not say who would comprise the Canadian delegation.

Ottawa is prepared to continue its tradition of peacekeeping in the Middle East, he said.

A civilian presence in Gaza would be similar to the Temporary International Presence in Hebron (TIPH), established soon after the Feb. 25 Hebron mosque massacre, in which 30 Palestinians were killed by a Jewish settler.

A temporary presence in Gaza is called for as part of the Israel-PLO accords signed last September.

Also last week, the PLO blamed Israel for blocking its request to prolong the three-month mandate of the TIPH, a charge hotly denied by Israel's UN Mission.

A letter from the PLO's UN representative to UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali said that "despite the PLO's repeated requests to Israel to extend the TIPH mandate, Israel refused to permit the international force to continue its activity until its stated goal is accomplished."

The letter said the international force in Hebron is alleviating the suffering of local residents, and its mission is not yet completed.

The PLO asked the Security Council to consider Israel's refusal.

UN Ambassador Gad Ya'acobi responded to the PLO charge in a separate letter to Boutros-Ghali, saying the PLO never formally requested an extension of the TIPH's mandate.

The force's term was set at three months by mutual agreement between Israel and the PLO, he wrote. There was never any discussion between the parties about extending that mandate, because the PLO never formally requested such a meeting.

IRB takes a look at how Israel treats religious minorities

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Starkly divergent descriptions of Israel's treatment of religious minorities were presented to members of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) during a day-long program held last Friday in Montreal.

Over the past two years, Israel has become a major source of refugee claimants in this country. Most of the applications have come from people from the former Soviet Union; often they are mixed-faith couples.

McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler described Israel as a model of human rights protection, while South African-born Israeli lawyer Lynda Brayer compared the distinctions made between Jew and non-Jew in Israel to the policy of apartheid practised by former South African governments.

The third panelist, Israeli lawyer Jonathan Livny, said he did not recognize the country described by Brayer and insisted she was dealing in "innuendo" and "half-truths." Both Brayer and Livny have many non-Jewish clients from the former Soviet Union.

Cotler accused Brayer of "defaming" Israel and undermining his credibility. Her counter charge was that Cotler was speaking on behalf of the Israeli Justice Ministry and not as an independent witness. The bitter antagonism between the two was frequently evident during the discussion.

Brayer, a Jew who converted to Catholicism six years ago, argued that non-Jewish immigrants do not have equal rights and are the victims of systemic discrimination and open prejudice.

Former Soviets suffer on two fronts, she said, because they are both Russian and Christian. She submitted an 18-page text in support of her conclusions.

Stating that "Israel is a Jewish country. . . It was established by Jews to recreate a Jewish homeland. I'm not embarrassed to say it," Livny maintained that there is no contradiction in a state's being both Jewish and democratic.

Cotler entered letters by two Catholic priests in Israel, Norbert Schwake and Daniel Rufeisen, as evidence contradicting Brayer's views on the treatment of Christians.

Cotler, who denied he was a spokesman for the Israeli government, said Israel should not be accepted as a refugee-producing country because "the state has the ability to protect its citizens" from human rights violations; therefore persons leaving Israel, though they may have suffered discrimination, do not fit the Geneva Convention definition of a refugee, he said.

Israel, he said, has a parliamentary democracy, anti-discrimination and anti-racism legislation, an independent judiciary (including the Supreme Court which citizens may petition directly), a free press, and non-governmental organizations that provide redress against rights violations.

Although Israel has no constitution as such, Cotler said, the 1992 "human dignity and liberty" law was amended this year to render the Declaration of Independence actionable before the courts.

Instances of discrimination against former Soviets are not surprising, given that Israel has received a half-million immigrants (10 per cent of its population) in less than five years, Cotler said. From this perspective, the number seeking refuge in Canada is relatively small.

Brayer countered that the "willingness" of the state to protect citizens is more important than its ability. The remedies outlined by Cotler are for Jews and not "the goy," she said.

Brayer claimed that the Israeli press portrays French-Canadian Catholics as "inveterate anti-Semites," because a higher number of Israeli claimants are being accepted by the IRB in Montreal than in Toronto.

The division of citizens according to Jew and non-Jew, as well as their degree of Jewishness, has "created a residual population that does not belong to the privileged religious group and cannot ever be assimilated into the existing system," she said.

Feinberg hopeful of finding a bone marrow match

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The sound of the clock's ticking is always in the back of Jay Feinberg's young mind.

So are the astronomical odds against finding a match for the healthy bone marrow Jay needs to save or prolong his life.

The 26-year-old native of West Orange, N.J., was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous/myeloid leukemia (CML), a particularly virulent strain of blood cancer, just over three years ago. He was given roughly three years to live.

With the help of oral chemotherapy and other drugs, Jay is not only managing, but even has a sunny disposition. He has already passed the critical 36-month median survival rate, albeit with some joint and back pain and headaches — none of which has deterred him, his family and friends from their dogged determination to find a compatible bone marrow match.

Sitting on a couch, occasionally touching his mother Arlene's arm, Jay recounts how, over the past three years, over 50,000 people worldwide in 125 clinics have had blood tests to determine their marrow's compatibility.

The search is confined to mainly Jews of Eastern European descent. Because the type of marrow in our bones is inherited, tissue types are ethnogeographically determined, meaning Jay's best chances for a match are among those who can trace their roots close to his family's, namely, to modern-day Belarus (Grodno area), Slovakia, northeastern Hungary and western Ukraine.

The most recent Canadian clinic for Jay, held last week at the B'nai Brith building, drew 370 people. Nearly 500 people came out to a July 4 clinic at the JCC. Kitchener, London and Windsor have also hosted tests. In Israel, over 3,000 people have been tested.

Arlene Feinberg says she can hardly keep up with demand for more clinics in Canada. The big problem is that each blood sample costs about $50 (US) to analyze, and the family is in desperate need of donations.

"We're going to have the September clinics but we may have to cancel the ones in October," sighs Arlene, speculating that the time may come when donors may be asked to pay what they can toward the tests.

So far, the Friends of Jay, a non-profit foundation set up by his family and friends, has raised over $2 million towards testing and equipment.

Even in all this darkness, Jay has encountered a bright spot. Last week, he went to a hospital to visit a Toronto teenaged boy, also suffering from leukemia, who received a perfect marrow match from a Windsor man. The marrow was found after clinics for Jay. "It made me feel great," he smiles. "It was an incredible day."

Jay's disease can accelerate at any time. Meanwhile, the Feinbergs have hired a genealogist to trace the family tree, and they have encountered fourth and fifth cousins they never knew existed, in a frantic but fruitless search for a match.

Jay says the chance of a perfect match "is like winning a lottery. You have to match all six antigens — the marker on the surface of the white blood cell." Jay has two brothers who are a perfect match for each other but not for Jay.

Israeli, Jordanian welcome new change in relations

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the warmth and goodwill with which they greeted each other, you'd never know their two communities had been in a state of war for almost 50 years.

Yet for Israeli consul general Dror Zeigerman and Jordanian-born editor Ziad Malawi, it was like two old friends meeting and renewing acquaintances.

Malawi, chief editor of Al-Mersal (The Messenger), was in Zeigerman's Toronto office recently to exchange gifts in commemoration of the peace accord signed last month in Washington between Jordan's King Hussein and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Malawi described the tabloid newspaper as "Arabic, with a Jordanian character." Published by the Canadian Arab Network, Al-Mersal's circulation stands at 20,000 and is available monthly. Its readership is situated primarily in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

In a brief ceremony at the consulate, Malawi presented Zeigerman with an olive wood carving representing the map of Jordan while receiving in return a miniature replica of an ancient Israeli vase.

But more important than the tokens exchanged was the fact that the Israeli-Jordanian rapprochement is having resonance elsewhere around the world.

Like King Hussein and Rabin, who met secretly several times prior to the publicized Washington signing ceremony, Malawi and Zeigerman had also met before, if not so secretly, at a meeting organized by B'nai Brith in the wake of the Israel-PLO agreement.

Zeigerman said Malawi telephoned him within hours of the Washington signing, asking if he could visit the consulate and greet him. "We met together and for me, it was a very exciting meeting. I told him that for me [the Declaration] fulfills a dream.

"As a fifth-generation Israeli, it was a dream of mine to cross the Jordan. It's a very narrow river but the most historic river. It was always a dream to see the other side" and to visit Petra, Amman and Jerash, the consul general said.

"The dream was stronger than reality and now we have fulfilled it. I hope that in a few months we will exchange visits."

Malawi, general secretary of the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF), recalled the first meeting with Zeigerman. "I really saw [the consul general] as a man of peace and vision," he said. "I explained I was not a Palestinian but an observer for the CAF and that I hoped we have peace and celebrate it. . . The first thing I thought about [during the Hussein/Rabin meeting] was of Dror's trip to Petra."

Malawi said he believes his native country and Israel can live in harmony. "We don't believe in war and radicalism," he said. "We believe in peace and reconciliation."

Pointing to peace overtures that go back to the creation of Israel, Malawi noted that Hussein's grandfather Abdullah "had wanted peace years before and if he'd succeeded, it could have saved many lives and flourished the economy for the Middle East."

Hussein "waited for the right moment [so that Jordan] could live together with Israel in harmony."

Malawi hoped that Jews and Jordanians in Canada would start dealing with each other in the open, pointing out that he has many Jewish associates but was made to feel guilty about that by others in the local Arab community.

"Now, it's a big weight off my shoulders."

The response in the Canadian Arab community to the Washington Declaration has been "mostly positive," he said. Many see it as an "obvious choice after the Palestinian agreement. It was a matter of time."

There are some dissenting voices who believe it is "premature," but Malawi said he has consistently urged a rapprochement, condemned terrorism and called on local Jordanians to be more demonstrative in support of recent peace developments.

The Canadian Arab community consists of immigrants from 20 countries, but most are Lebanese, Palestinians, Iraqis and Egyptians, Malawi said. The Jordanians revere King Hussein for a lineage that goes back to the prophet Mohammed and refer to him as "my master."

Malawi said he expects that joint Jewish-Jordanian community meetings may eventually be held, as well as a joint junket to Israel and Jordan.

"We could go on El Al and come back on Royal Jordanian," he said with a smile.

Na'amat Israel helps teens living on the street

TORONTO — Each year Na'amat Israel is responsible for rehabilitating more than a thousand teenage street kids and sheltering hundreds of abused young children.

"The members of our Na'amat Canada mission to Israel were shocked to discover that 200,000 Israeli children live below the poverty line," Esther Rodzynek, Na'amat's Toronto president, told The CJN after her recent return.

"Eighty thousand children each year suffer physical abuse. And it's tragic to see how many are developmentally hampered by neglect or early-environment deprivation. These children are Israel's citizens of tomorrow and it is important that they be given the opportunity to reach their full potential — particularly now, when there are so many tough challenges ahead.

"Israel has achieved amazing accommodations with Jordan and the PLO but it will be this upcoming generation that will have to make the really tough decisions and face the new realities," says Rodzynek.

Swed brothers flee Syria after years of prison brutality

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Brothers Eli and Selim Swed, who served the longest prison terms of any Syrian Jews, have fled Syria, The CJN has learned.

The Sweds arrived in New York City earlier this year, along with Selim's wife Sara and their six children, according to Judy Feld Carr, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force for Syrian Jews.

The brothers, who endured years of medieval conditions, torture and beatings, are in terrible condition, "but at least they're out," says Carr, who has been in contact with the family ever since the brothers were arrested in late 1987. She met them recently.

Eli, a 38-year-old bachelor, was taken into custody in November 1987 after returning from a clandestine trip to Israel, where he visited two sisters. He never made it out of the Damascus airport and was taken to a secret police interrogation centre. His family were waiting for him at the airport, and assumed he was not returning from the trip.

Carr says Eli was blindfolded for two weeks and had the fillings in his teeth removed because police thought he had a transmitter in his mouth.

In the basement of the interrogation centre, he was handcuffed for two months and subjected to beatings, torture with electric shock and sleep deprivation. He was not allowed to wash for eight months. After 18 months, he "confessed" to spying for Israel.

Selim, now 55, was abducted by the feared Mukhabarat (secret police) in December 1987 and also tortured.

In May 1989, the brothers were placed in the same cell. It measured one by 1.5 metres, and there they stayed for the next four months before being transferred to the notorious Adra prison in Damascus, known to human rights groups for its maze of underground torture chambers.

In early 1990, the brothers were finally brought to trial and sentenced to five years hard labor for spying for Israel, endangering Syria's security and entering a country (Israel) for which no visa is provided.

At an in camera hearing in May 1991, the sentence was boosted to 6½ years. Neither the defendants nor their lawyer were allowed to speak, and the brothers went on a highly-publicized hunger strike, despite their desperate physical conditions.

Following their sentencing, Syrian president Hafez al-Assad offered a 15-day period during which pleas for clemency were heard.

Canada's then external affairs minister Barbara McDougall asked for a reconsideration of the sentence on humanitarian grounds.

The Sweds were released in April 1992 for no stated reason.

It was also in April 1992 when Assad relaxed travel rules for Syrian Jews. Over 2,500 Jews left for the United States before the doors were abruptly closed again six months later.

A steady trickle continue to come out, despite a new Syrian policy of splitting families.

The Sweds arrived in Brooklyn's large Syrian Jewish emigre community in April. Carr says Eli is in especially bad shape.

The problem with Syrian Jewish emigration, Carr notes, is that those who leave must do so as visitors. Thus, they cannot claim refugee status in the United States, and the entitlements that status confers.

As well, Jews leaving Syria cannot sell possessions or businesses. They can leave with the equivalent of $2,000 (US) and two suitcases each.

For decades, Syria's Jews were subjected to state-sanctioned harassment, constant monitoring by police and arbitrary detention.

The community has dwindled to about 300 in Damascus, 100 in Qamishli and just five in Aleppo, says Carr. She believes most of those will leave but that a handful, mainly elderly or those set in their ways, will stay.

Decision on day schools status imminent: Johnson

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Premier Daniel Johnson said a decision "one way or the other" should be made within the next two weeks on the issue of "associate status" for the Jewish day schools.

In a brief interview with The CJN late last week, Johnson said of the discussions that have been taking place between the education ministry and the Montreal Catholic School Commission (MCSC): "The matter is moving forward. I'm hopeful."

The MCSC has agreed in principle to forming an association with the Jewish schools, said Johnson. He also indicated that he will meet with Education Minister Jacques Chagnon this week on the matter.

On another question, Johnson upheld the Liberal party's "star" candidate in Bourassa, former union leader Yvon Charbonneau. The premier seemed somewhat surprised that some Jews viewed this as insensitive because at one time, Charbonneau had been very vocally anti-Zionist.

"People mellow," Johnson said. For some years, Charbonneau has been more concerned with environmental and economic issues than international politics.

Johnson also suggested Charbonneau's entry into mainstream politics has to be viewed in the light of the changes that have taken place in the world. "The Berlin Wall has come down ... Arafat and Rabin are having lunch together," he said.

In the days when Charbonneau was a union leader, it was not uncommon for people to take "radical" positions on issues related to the Middle East, he said.

"I never gathered that anti-Semitism or the Jewish community were the targets of [Charbonneau's] comments."

Johnson spoke to The CJN after meeting the Jewish community representatives and D'Arcy McGee Liberals at Adath Israel-Poale Zedek Congregation.

He expressed confidence the Liberals, with candidate Lawrence Bergman, will win back the riding. "My wife and I often shop in Cavendish Mall and we get a tremendous reception. People say, 'We are going to vote for you.' They didn't say that in 1989.

"We don't take anyone for granted. We need every vote."

Conference for Jewish deaf draws people from near, far

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 300 people gathered at the Sheraton Centre Hotel recently for the 20th Biennial Convention of the National Congress of Jewish Deaf (NCJD), a festive event highlighted by Sabbath services complete with a choir of signers.

Workshops dealt with topics such as Adopting Deaf Children, Homosexuality in the Deaf Jewish Community, and Reconciling Deaf and Jewish Identities. The latter issue was a recurring theme. Keynote speaker Rabbi Gunther Plaut spoke about aging.

The convention, held for the first time in Canada, brought together participants from as far away as Australia, France, Belgium, England and Israel, but the majority were North American.

The Toronto Jewish Association for the Deaf (TJAD), the only Canadian NCJD affiliate, hosted the convention. The group has a mailing list of 200 in and near the Toronto area. There are thought to be fewer than 50 deaf Jews living outside Toronto in Canada.

Israel has about 20,000 deaf Jews, 1,000 of whom are Russian olim, according to recent estimates.

The NCJD, established in New York in 1956 to foster Jewish identity and knowledge among the Jewish deaf, has a comparatively small membership of 600, although there are thought to be 50,000 deaf Jews in the United States.

"Our task now would be to reach out to those 50,000 and let them know about NCJD," said Barbara Boyd, the organization's outgoing president, speaking in sign language through an interpreter. "We've already seen an increase in membership because of this conference, and we're very proud of it."

The convention was an impressive undertaking. A typical session had both a hearing interpreter to "voice" what was being signed (or to sign, if the speaker was talking), as well as a note-taker to summarize key points on an overhead projector. French interpreters were also available.

Communication barriers were overcome with commendable efficiency, given that sign languages have a complexity all their own. American Sign Language (ASL), for example, the common language of deaf North Americans, has a unique grammatical structure, making it difficult for users to speak and sign at the same time. ASL is now recognized as a proper language, although it was not always seen that way by the hearing community.

Signed English is not a language, but rather a manual code often used to teach English or translate word-for-word. Finger-spelling refers to the spelling of words in which each letter is signified by a different hand configuration.

Sign languages used in other countries are as different from each other as English and Hebrew. Although one interpreter was stymied momentarily when a participant used an unfamiliar British sign, the mix of hearing, deaf and hard-of-hearing people using voice, sign, lip-reading and written notes worked.

There were few hearing participants other than the interpreters and some of the workshop leaders. Karen Bain of Cleveland, the mother of 10-year-old Lauren, who is deaf, thought she was the only hearing person in the room at one workshop. "It gave me an idea of what our daughter has to live with every day," she said.

Bain and her husband Ken were happy to have the opportunity to meet Jewish deaf people, they said. In Cleveland, there is no organization for deaf Jews. "Everyone's been very, very nice," she said.

Sharon Soudakoff of Los Angeles was elected NCJD president for a two-year term, replacing Boyd who is now vice-president, administration.

Upcoming conferences for the Jewish deaf include an international conference to be held next year in London, England, from July 23 to 27. The World Organisation of Jewish Deaf (WOJD) has held conferences every four years since 1976. The theme of the conference will be Towards a Freer World, and it is expected that participants will include deaf Jews from former Communist countries. For further information about the conference, contact Steven Bloomfield, Bloomfield Ceramic Restorations Ltd., Flat 18, Centre Heigths, Swiss Cottage, London NW3 6JG England (fax 71-722-8740).

The next NCJD conference will be held in 1996 in Chicago. For further information contact Martyn Wayne of TJAD at 905-669-2525 (TTY access number is 1-800-855-0511) or by fax at 416-392-3821.

Confusion over war crimes cases

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There finally appears to be some movement on the war crimes portfolio, but in which direction remains unclear.

Justice Department spokesmen have confirmed that eight cases have been forwarded to the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration with the recommendation that denaturalization hearings be implemented to strip the suspects of citizenship or that deportation proceedings be launched against those who are landed immigrants.

But Immigration spokesman Roger White said the ministry has written back to Justice officials requesting final recommendations on the cases.

"The reports they've sent raise complex issues," he said. "The department will make decisions as soon as possible, but we have written back to ask for formal recommendations on at least this first number of cases."

Jim Mathieson, a lawyer for the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said the unit has not received any requests for further information.

"We have provided our final report and Immigration has all the information it needs. . . Our position is that there isn't anything left for us to do regarding recommendations.

"We've done all there is to do and it's the responsibility of the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration to determine whether to revoke citizenship or deport [non-citizens]," Mathieson told The CJN.

Speaking earlier this week, White said "I was told by two of our immigration department lawyers that we have written to the Justice Department for final recommendatons in how to deal with these eight cases."

While the ministries tried to sort out the cases, Jewish groups reacted positively to the war crimes unit's move.

"We're encouraged by these reports," said Jack Silverstone, national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress. "There are still steps to go but it's an encouraging development. We must now see that the recommendations are expeditiously transferred to the Immigration Department to carry them out."

Jonathan Richler, national chair of B'nai Brith's war crimes committee, agreed. "We urge the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration to review expeditiously the Justice Department's reports on war crimes suspects," he said.

"Time is of the essence and, where appropriate, deportation cases should be launched immediately."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said he was concerned that the cases not "fall between the ministries."

Peter Kremer, head of the war crimes unit, said the eight files were part of a batch of 18 "priority one" cases under investigation for some time. "The priority one cases we were working on are finished or nearing completion," he said.

He discounted suggestions that the unit is now focusing on denaturalization and deportation instead of criminal prosecutions. The unit investigates all legal remedies, he said.

For the past few years, Jewish groups have been urging the unit to shift focus to the denaturalization remedy, arguing that it is easier to make a civil case than a criminal one. The unit's only success in its seven-year history involved former Dutch collaborator Jacob Luitjens, who was stripped of his citizenship and deported to his native Holland about two years ago.

Kremer said the Luitjens decision set a precedent for proving cases based on circumstantial evidence.

Although immigration records were destroyed in the course of time, the judge in the case inferred that Luitjens must have lied about his wartime activities or he would not have been permitted into Canada and obtained citizenship.

Mathieson said he expected about 20 cases "and possibly more" will eventually be forwarded to the Immigration Department for action.

Correction

Due to an editing error, the story in the August 11 CJN concerning the naming of the Jewish cemetery in Quebec City as a national historic site, misidentified the rabbi of the Beth Israel Ohav Shalom synagogue. His name is Rabbi Samuel Prager. The CJN regrets the error.

IRB takes a look at Israel

Christianity is such "anathema" to Jews that schoolchildren in Israel are taught an inverted T as a plus sign in arithmetic because the traditional cross is too reminiscent of the Christian symbol, she claimed. [A number of Israelis in Canada told The CJN that they had never heard of this practice.]

There is no constitution guaranteeing equal rights for all and thus no recourse to the courts, Breyer said.

Contradicting Cotler's statement, Brayer said that the Declaration of Independence affirming Israel as a state for the Jewish people is still legally valid. She claimed that the 1992 "human dignity" law does not override this.

Identity cards highlight this stratification of citizens, she said. Non-Jews married to Jews from the former Soviet Union have their nationality marked as Russian or Ukrainian, for example, while the Jewish partner's nationality is listed as Jewish. (There is no "Israeli" nationality.)

In cases where Jewish ancestry cannot be proven or one is a "messianic Jew," nationality is not registered. "By rabbinic law, he is a 'questionable Jew,' not really a goy, but not fully a Jew," she said.

In the case of one who has immigrated under provisions of the Law of Return but who is not Jewish by religious law, no card is issued and one is "a stateless person," she claimed.

Those without cards do not receive the normal benefits for immigrants from the government and "socially, [they] are outcasts," she said. Similarly, non-Jews who divorce a Jew "lose all rights by virtue of not being Jewish."

Non-Jews she said cannot own land and have no protection against losing their jobs for not being Jewish.

They also face unfair treatment from the police and have difficulty being heard by a court. In the schools, children are subject to harassment from their peers and teachers, she charged. Religious officials constantly pressure them to convert.

She compared the status of the non-Jewish former Soviets' status to that of the Marranos in medieval Spain.

Breyer's allegations regarding Israeli law and its application were flatly contradicted by the other panellists.

Livny, who was an activist for Soviet Jewish aliyah in the '70s, operates a legal clinic with the Zionist Forum for Soviet Jewry, an organization founded by Natan Scharansky.

Israelis are in an uproar over the IRB's acceptance of some refugee claimants from Israel because the state was created as a haven for Jewish refugees and any suggestion that "it mistreats people touches a raw nerve and sends chills down the spine," Livny said.

"In what country is there not prejudice, especially when newcomers receive so many rights those born there do not get?" he asked.

He claimed Brayer's portrayal was "very one-sided and unfair."

He said almost 40 per cent of his clients are non-Jews "and they have the same problems as Jews."

He stated he is not aware of one case where a non-Jewish former-Soviet did not receive normal immigrant benefits, such as housing subsidies, even after a divorce; or an ID card, once they had immigrant status.

In employment, non-Jews are often favored because they are considered to have a better work ethic, he claimed.

Where there are problems is in matters of personal status, such as marriage, divorce and even burial because these are under the authority of the Orthodox rabbinate, Livny said. But non-Jews and interfaith couples, in some respects, are better off in this regard than Reform Jews like himself, he said.

As for land ownership, he noted that the Mormon Church was given "the best property in Israel" to build a university in Jerusalem.

"The issue is not Jew versus non-Jew . . . The true spirit of Judaism is to treat the stranger amongst you as yourself. We have not yet fully achieved a Jewish democratic state in this spirit but we are on the right way," Livny said.

About 140 people attended the program. IRB spokesman Suzanne Mayhew said 60 were IRB members from Montreal (of 210 members), eight were from Ottawa and one from Toronto. The rest were mostly lawyers and representatives of non-governmental organizations (NGOs), including several Jewish groups.

IRB assistant vice-president Pierre Duquette, who chaired the program, said it was scheduled several months ago and was not held in response to recent media coverage of the issue.

The three speakers were invited by the IRB to provide information in addition to what the IRB already has on Israel, he said. The program is to be transcribed and made available to all IRB offices, as are the materials submitted by the three speakers.

A follow-up session in the afternoon was devoted to answering written questions from the audience. They sought more details on religious freedom, the power of the Orthodox rabbinate, allegations of police negligence, the function of ID cards, circumcision, public schooling, and the image of Russian women.

CSIS denies spying allegations against CBC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS) has denied allegations it spied on the CBC.

"The suggestion that CSIS has spied on the CBC is without substance or foundation," stated a CSIS news release last week.

According to an article in the Toronto Star last week, CSIS used a mole in the white supremacist Heritage Front to obtain information about a CBC investigation into racism in the Armed Forces.

Citing from a "highly classified" document it obtained, the Star reported that a CSIS source inside the Heritage Front informed the spy agency that the CBC's Fifth Estate was researching a story about racist infiltration of the Armed Forces.

An earlier report in the Toronto Sun indicated that Grant Bristow, one of the Heritage Front's founders, was on the CSIS payroll. The document obtained by the Star would seem to corroborate the earlier story.

The most recent allegations concerning CSIS will be part of a review of the spy agency that is being conducted by the Security Intelligence Review Committee, said Blaine Harvey, a spokesman for Solicitor General Herb Gray.

RCMP seeking witnesses

OTTAWA — The war crimes and special investigations section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) is seeking witnesses to the mass murder of civilians in two locations in Lithuania during World War II.

One series of executions took place in the Obliai and Baijoria Forests in Roskiskis, Lithuania during 1941.

A second mass murder of civilians took place in 1944 in the town of Vievis, Trakia District of Lithuania by members of the 253rd Schutzmannschaft Battalion.

Those who have direct knowledge of these events or who can assist in locating persons who could provide such information are asked to contact the RCMP directly by telephoning collect to (613) 990-8481 and asking for investigating constable R. Barry.

Those with information could also write to: The Commanding Officer, 'A' Division, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 155 McArthur Ave., Vanier, Ont., K1A 0R4, Attention: war crimes and special investigations section. All information will be treated as confidential.

Alternatively, those with information may contact Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress at (416) 635-2883, who will serve as a liaison with the RCMP.

Toronto Federation steps in to take over JCC's finances

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's official. The Jewish Community Centre (JCC) last week asked the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to take over the task of implementing the rescue and reorganization of the cash-strapped centre.

The move effectively gives the Federation overall control over the JCC's finances and management, said Howard English, a spokesman for the Federation.

A new seven-person board of directors will be appointed as part of the reorganization scheme. The three-person committee of Sharon Bacal, Helen Finder-Guttman and Alex Grossman, which has been overseeing JCC operations since the centre's board and officers resigned conditionally, will be part of the new board, he added.

Bank demanding payment

In other developments, the Bank of Montreal, the JCC's largest creditor, sent a letter to the JCC demanding payment of the money owing to it, English said. The bank calculates that sum at about $9.7 million.

Subsequent to the letter, representatives of the JCC and the Federation met with bank officials who requested a formal, written proposal outlining the rescue plan. The Federation and JCC agreed to the request, English said.

Later in the week, representatives of the Bloor Street branch and the Northeast Valley branch submitted presentations for bank officers describing their plans to raise funds to pay their portions of the debt.

Under terms of the JCC/Federation plan, the downtown branch is to raise $3 million (with Federation assistance), and the Valley $1 million to go towards payment of the debt. They will then become independent centres.

A TASTE OF CANADA

The Sheraton Tel Aviv recently hosted a Taste of Canada reception, where some 250 guests enjoyed fresh salmon flown in from Canada, and prepared by renowned chef Marcel Kretz, formerly of La Sapeniere in Val David, Que. The event was sponsored by Air Canada and El Al, and held to honor the National Ballet of Canada, which was touring Israel at the time. From left were Yossi Wircer of the Sheraton Tel Aviv; "Mountie" Gene McLean; Leon Koffler of Superpharm Inc. and Canada's ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector.

Arafat defends the PLO charter

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — Yasser Arafat is blaming Israel for the PLO's delay in revoking chapters in the organization's charter calling for the destruction of Israel.

Speaking at a joint news conference with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres in Gaza City last Friday, Arafat said the anti-Israel clauses of the PLO charter could not be changed because Israel is not allowing all 480 members of the Palestine National Council to enter the Gaza Strip to attend a meeting at which a vote to amend the charter would be taken.

The sentiment was reinforced Sunday, when Fatah's Central Committee in Tunis decided that the Palestinian Covenant calling for Israel's destruction won't be changed until Israel recognizes a Palestinian state.

Abu Nizar, a member of Fatah's Central Committee, said the decision was taken on Saturday night at a meeting chaired by Arafat.

"If Israel does not recognize the establishment of a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as [its] capital, there would not be any decision to cancel the clauses of the charter calling for the liberation of Palestine," Nizar said.

If Nizar is correct, the demand would be a violation of the Oslo accords, since Palestinian statehood is an issue that is not to be discussed until final talks, while the PLO is committed to change its covenant as soon as possible.

In an earlier display of disharmony, Peres, appearing disturbed, interrupting Arafat to tell reporters, "I told the chairman we shall not object to have the PNC meet in Gaza, and (we) invite all its members to come and participate in the meeting."

Arafat then appeared to throw the whole issue into question, saying he could not guarantee that the PNC would change the anti-Israel clauses.

Declaration of Principles

"I haven't the right to [guarantee] it. You have to respect our democracy. This is the business of the members of the PNC," he said.

In the past, Arafat has repeatedly maintained that he would call for the repeal of those sections of the PLO charter which call for the destruction of Israel.

His promise served in part as the basis for the mutual recognition pact between Israel and the PLO, which enabled the parties to sign the Declaration of Principles on Palestinian self-rule last September in Washington.

Peres, the highest-ranking Israeli official to visit Gaza since autonomy began there and in Jericho in May, met with Arafat and Norwegian Foreign Minister Bjorn Tore Godal.

The meeting marked the first anniversary of the agreement reached in Oslo — an agreement that set the stage for the Israeli-PLO peace accord.

During the news conference, Peres highlighted the issue of security, saying the Palestinian leadership must stop attacks on Israelis by radical Palestinian groups if the peace accord is to succeed.

"It is in the Palestinian interest to fight terror," Peres said. "You can't develop Gaza and other areas if the terrorists prevent the development of tourism, industry and the like."

Detention ordered

Last week, Arafat ordered the detention of at least 30 members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement, which has claimed responsibility for recent attacks on Israelis. Most of the detained, however, were later released.

"We will not accept any challenge to discipline in the Palestinian territories," Arafat said.

He also used the occasion to renew his pleas for foreign assistance, which donor countries have pledged but withheld, demanding strict accounting procedures on the part of the PLO.

"Not to forget, we are starting from zero and we need help from all our friends everywhere," Arafat said.

The Norwegian foreign minister said his country would help pay the salaries of the Palestinian police until the pledges of foreign assistance, estimated at $600 million for this year alone, begin to arrive.

Meanwhile, Peres used the occasion to announce that starting this week, Israel would transfer responsibility for education to Palestinians throughout the West Bank.

"For the first time in history, the Palestinian people will be responsible for their own children, for their own education," Peres said.

The move represented the first phase in the so-called "early empowerment," the transfer to Palestinian control of such areas as education, health, tourism and taxation throughout the West Bank.

In a related development, Israeli officials announced last Friday the release of some 250 Palestinian prisoners on condition they remain in the Jericho autonomous region until the end of their prison sentences.

Among those released were Palestinians convicted of killing fellow Arabs suspected of collaborating with Israel.

Israeli authorities said those released were the last of 5,000 Palestinian prisoners Israel had promised to set free under the terms of the May 4 Cairo agreement for implementing self-rule in Gaza and Jericho.

Officials said any new prisoner releases would have to be negotiated in new talks.

Palestinians responded with demonstrations in Jerusalem on Saturday, demanding the release of all remaining prisoners.

The News in Brief

Israel Says No to Iraq

JERUSALEM — Israel reportedly has assured the United States that it will not respond to any diplomatic overtures from Iraq.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin conveyed the message to Warren Christopher during the U.S. Secretary of State's recent shuttle trip to the region, according to media reports here.

It followed an overture several weeks ago by the Iraqis at the United Nations, to which Israel was rumored to have responded coolly.

Rabin told Christopher that Jerusalem endorses the Clinton administration's "dual containment" policy, which seeks to isolate and contain both Iran and Iraq.

That is the same policy Israeli diplomats abroad reportedly have been instructed to follow.

An Iraqi official reportedly expressed interest in ongoing peace moves in the region six weeks ago to Gad Ya'acobi, the Israeli ambassador to the UN, who cabled home for instructions.

Ya'acobi reportedly was told, in effect, to rebuff his colleague from Baghdad.

Europeans Step Up Contacts

TEL AVIV — Greece and Holland have announced plans to follow the lead of Germany, which has established diplomatic representation in the Palestinian autonomous area of Jericho.

A German liaison office was opened recently in Jericho, with the task of monitoring the Palestinian authority's use of Germany's financial grant to the autonomous Gaza Strip and Jericho regions.

The Greek and Dutch foreign ministries announced that their countries would also soon be setting up liaison offices in Jericho for the same purpose.

No Change in Yemen

NEW YORK — Reports of a shift in Yemen's policy toward its Jews are exaggerated, Western officials say.

The Associated Press recently quoted a Yemeni government official as saying Yemen has begun allowing members of its Jewish community to emigrate.

In fact, Yemen has been allowing Jewish emigration for well over a year, reflecting a general opening toward the West.

About 500 Yemeni Jews have left the country since unification of the north and south in 1990, most moving to Israel. About 500 Jews remain in Yemen.

The recent civil war, however, severed all air links out of the country.

Sources familiar with the Jewish community in Yemen say that departures have yet to resume, despite the press report to the contrary.

Move Over, Guys

TEL AVIV — Citing sexual discrimination, a recent immigrant from South Africa has petitioned Israel's High Court of Justice to force the Israeli Air Force to allow her to join a pilot training course.

Alice Miller, 22, brought the petition with the support of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel after the Air Force rejected her application to take the training course.

She claimed sexual discrimination was behind the rejection, since she had obtained a civilian pilot license before immigrating to Israel, and has since earned a degree in aeronautical engineering from the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa.

The Air Force, which was given 45 days to prepare its response, said its refusal was based on the Israel Defence Force's opposition to allowing women to serve in combat areas.

Golan Settlers 'Appreciated'

HAIFA — Tourism Minister Uzi Baram last week said his ministry would not support investment in any new tourist projects on the Golan.

However, he stressed that the ministry would continue to assist existing tourist sites and help ensure that projects already under way would be completed.

Baram, who was touring the north, including the Golan, said he could not ignore the political changes in the region.

The minister said he "deeply appreciated" the presence of Jewish settlers on the Golan, but warned that sacrifices might have to be made in return for peace with Syria.

HU Hosts Indonesian Scholar

JERUSALEM — The Hebrew University of Jerusalem recently hosted its first visiting scholar from Indonesia, which has the world's largest Muslim population (171 million).

Halim Mahfudz, a journalist and academic, spent three weeks at the university's Harry S Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace, where he attended a conference on the PLO and Israel and interviewed Palestinians and Israelis for articles to appear in the Indonesian press.

Mahfudz was invited by Moshe Maoz, head of the institute, whom he had met when Maoz visited his home city, Surabaya.

Although contacts between Indonesia and Israel are limited (there are some organized tours by Israelis to Indonesia) and Mahfudz said that there was not much interest in the Middle East among Indonesians, he believes that more mutual tourism could develop, along with business activity and possibly official diplomatic relations.

TV Station Cancels Film

SYDNEY — Responding to protests by the leadership of Australia's Jewish community, a television station in Adelaide has canceled the showing of a film produced by what a station spokesman described as "neo-Nazi apologists."

Adelaide's Community and Educational Television station had originally defended its decision to schedule the film, A Search for Truth in History, saying the station, a public-access outlet, had "a charter to reflect the view of the total community, including extreme views."

The film features English writer and Holocaust denier David Irving arguing that the facts of the Holocaust are myths created by the Diaspora and the State of Israel for propaganda purposes.

The station called the film "a denigration of the Holocaust" and said it would not allow the channel to "incite racial acrimony."

Los Angeles Tensions

LOS ANGELES — A suspicious-looking metal box was exploded by police last week at the Simon Wiesenthal Centre here, while at the same time, a bomb threat forced evacuation of the University of Judaism.

Private security guards discovered the metal box, which was near the entrance to the Wiesenthal Centre. At about the same time, police received an anonymous phone call that a bomb would explode at the centre.

The metal box was detonated by remote control but police would not say whether it contained any explosive material, pending laboratory tests.

At the University of Judaism, two suspicious objects were sighted in the library and another part of the main building. After the objects were identified, the alarm was called off.

Static from Aircraft Carrier

HAIFA — The U.S.S. George Washington, the world's largest aircraft carrier, anchored here last week for a five-day shore leave for the crew.

The arrival of the giant floating city, with its 5,500 officers and men, was welcomed by Haifa's merchants.

But the arrival proved to be a major problem for Israeli users of cellular telephones. The massive amount of electronic equipment aboard the 1,300-foot vessel caused major interference with the portable phones until Bezek, Israel's state-owned telephone company, managed to change the frequencies used by the phones.

5,000 Visit Yad Vashem Daily

JERUSALEM — Some 5,000 people visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem daily, according to the first survey by the institution.

The museum and memorial is visited by about 1.3 million people annually, making it the most visited site in the country after the Western Wall, according to the survey.

Yad Vashem chairman Avner Shalev noted that the museum was originally built to accommodate only about 300,000 visitors per year.

German Beth Din Established

BONN — For the first time since the end of World War II, German Jewry has established a rabbinical court (beth din) to issue Halachic rulings.

The beth din, comprised of three rabbis, was set up recently in Munich to deal with conversions, divorces and other issues of general concern to the religious community.

Prior to the establishment of the court, individual rabbis issued rulings which were not always recognized by rabbinical authorities elsewhere, particularly in Israel.

In some cases, the local Jewish community sought rulings from rabbis in other countries, sometimes from as far away as Israel or the United States.

Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi makes official visit to Canada

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — While six million Jews died in the Holocaust, millions more perished spiritually, Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi has said.

Rabbi Israel Meir Lau said of those who survived, "their spirit is gone. They died inside. Many lost their traditions and their heritage. They made a terrible spiritual sacrifice."

Rabbi Lau was addressing 600 people crowded into the sweltering Chabad House earlier this month.

He said their children and grandchildren need to understand the message of the Holocaust, that they can remain Jewish despite all odds. He cited a message found in a bottle from a Warsaw ghetto fighter which said "you can take everything from me but you can't destroy my faith."

The rabbi, who was elected chief rabbi last year, was on his first official visit to Canada. The guest of Schara Tzedeck congregation, he spent a hectic weekend here. He arrived on a Friday with his wife, held a hurried press conference, attended the Shabbat services that evening at the shul, delivered a Shabbat sermon, then participated in a congregational kiddush. He delivered a d'var Torah at shalosh seudos.

Sunday morning he officiated and spoke at the dedication of the Earl and Jennie Lohn chapel at Schara Tzedeck cemetery, in nearby New Westminster. This was followed by a congregational lunch at the shul where the rabbi enjoyed blintzes, lokshen kugel, bagels, lox, salad and pastry.

Then it was off to private meetings

Rabbi Israel Meir Lau

and in the public evening meeting at Chabad House.

The Chief Rabbi was under heavy security and declined to give interviews. When approached by The CJN, the exhausted Rabbi Lau asked for rachmonos (pity) and begged off a promised interview.

During his public address he denied published reports that he had met the future John Paul II as a child left with Polish Catholic neighbors for safekeeping. In the story, which Rabbi Lau said was "just a misunderstanding," the Jewish child is brought for baptism but the priest — the future Pope — declines knowing the parents wanted their son raised as a Jew. Rabbi Lau met the Pope only last September.

The chief rabbi was non-political during his visit here. He told the press conference that Israel is divided between a desire for peace and its mistrust of the PLO. "Don't forget," he said, "we sacrificed more than 20,000 young lives, soldiers and victims of terror, in the past 46 years. We can't forget it in one shaking of the hands — it takes time."

Rabbi Lau said it is easier to accept the recent peace deal with King Hussein because Jordan has more of a government. "With the PLO we have to pray to the Almighty."

Rabbi Lau's acceptance of the arrangement with Jordan was indicated to some extent by a recent front page photo in the Globe and Mail, which showed him and Chief Sephardi Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron applauding from the Knesset balcony after Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's speech seeking support for the Israel-Jordan pact.

Rabbi Lau was liberated from Buchenwald by the Americans, the youngest captive there, at the age of 8. He was homeless and orphaned but managed to get to the fledgling Israel with a group of other youngsters.

He studied at the Fonovetz Yeshiva and in 1979 began his career as district rabbi of North Tel Aviv, followed by chief rabbi of Netanya and chief rabbi of Tel Aviv. He is the descendant of 36 generations of rabbis.

He was introduced at the public meeting by an old friend and fellow Buchenwald survivor, Robert Weisman of the Vancouver Holocaust Society. Dr. Robert Krell, president of the society, chaired the meeting. Others who spoke were Prof. William Nicholls, founding member of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Committee and Marie Doduck, a survivor.

Israeli court rejects petition saying peace pact is illegal

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice has rejected a petition by a Canadian lawyer charging that the Declaration of Principles signed between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization is illegal.

Howard Grief, a Montreal-born lawyer who immigrated to Israel in 1989 and became a member of the Israel bar, drafted the petition on behalf of 26 Israeli professors and writers. The petition argues that the DoP was signed illegally and should therefore be considered null and void.

However at an August 11 hearing, a three-judge panel of the High Court of Justice refused to rule on the petition, arguing that the matter was "clearly political" and therefore not subject to court jurisdiction.

"I am disappointed by the verdict, which was simply an evasion of the issue," said Grief.

"Any case involving the actions of the government is automatically political. But our case challenges a government policy on the basis of alleged legal violations. This is different than challenging the wisdom of a government policy. The Court failed to make that important distinction," charged Grief.

The petition, which was drafted by Grief and presented to the High Court by Israeli lawyer David Heimowitz, argues that the DoP was illegal on several grounds.

First, it violates Israel's Basic Law (the closest thing Israel has to a constitution) because it was signed without the approval or even knowledge of the cabinet. The fact that it was later ratified by the cabinet does not change the fact that it was signed illegally, argues the petition.

Second as a terrorist organization, the PLO has no authority to sign contracts under international law, and therefore cannot be a party to an international agreement. Even if the Knesset passed a law making the PLO legal, it would continue to fit the definition of a terrorist organization according to Israel's Penal Law, says the petition.

Moreover, the failure of the Palestinian National Council to ratify the DoP and amend the Palestinian covenant — as promised by PLO chairman Yasser Arafat — renders the agreement null and void under international law.

And finally Israeli law does not authorize anyone other than the government of Israel to apply the law of the state. Therefore, the Palestinian Authority has no right to govern in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, asserts the petition.

"I think we had strong grounds," said Grief. "The petition can be used to challenge any future agreement stemming from the Declaration of Principles. We hope to bring it to court again in the future when there is a different government in power, and perhaps, a different panel of judges.

"I think this court was afraid of intervening in the political process. The judges simply didn't want to rile the government," he charged. "They acted in a self-serving way."

State attorney Malchiel Blass argued the petition was "of an overwhelmingly political nature" — an argument that was ultimately accepted by the court. Judges Aharon Barak, Dalia Dorner and Dov Levin pointed out that several similar petitions had been rejected in recent months for the same reason.

Grief, who spent 10 months preparing the petition, would not reveal who sponsored it, but said there were no organizations involved. Most of the contributions came from individuals who read an article he wrote on the subject in Nativ, the cultural magazine of the settlement movement. Among the 26 writers and professors he represented are several leading figures in the settlement movement, including writer Israel Eldad and author Moshe Shamir.

Grief used to be the representative of the rightwing Tehiya party in the Canadian Zionist Federation during the '80s. After moving to Israel, he worked as a legal advisor to then-Science and Energy Minister Yuval Ne'eman, a leader of the now defunct Tehiya party.

Grief left the government following the election that brought Yitzhak Rabin to power. Before immigrating to Israel in 1989, he ran a general law practice in Montreal for 23 years.

Rabbinical Reflections

By
RABBI MORDECHAI E. ZEITZ

It is just about Neilah time for the year 5754. Is it possible that a year has already gone by?

I barely remember the sounding of the shofar to mark the beginning of the year and its haunting sound to mark the end of Yom Kippur. And now, we have been sounding the shofar this entire month, reminding ourselves that this year is coming to an abrupt end.

What a momentous year this has been. Rosh Hashanah heralded a peace accord with that moving but frightening scene on the White House lawn. "Moving" because finally we were witnessing a breakthrough towards the elusive peace everyone has been seeking in the Middle East. "Frightening" because Israel's designated partner for peace was the individual responsible for so much of the death and destruction of innocents for these many years.

Gaza and Jericho became self-administered and King Hussein of Jordan inaugurated borders with Israel.

Although terrorism still spills innocent Israeli blood, many rationalize this to be the price for peace. The debate continues to rage as to how steep a price one must pay now and in the future.

But the peace process seemed to have a life of its own, making more headway this past year than in the previous 50 years combined.

As the Middle East was grappling with change, so too was South Africa undergoing radical change. A new country was born and the impossible was achieved. And while South Africa was successfully bringing races and people together, right here within our own borders we are once again preoccupied with the debate about separation of language and people.

This past year saw the continuing brutality in Bosnia and new human tragedy in Rwanda. In a time of great change some things do not change at all.

If that was not enough, we watched with shocked disbelief when a car bomb leveled the main headquarters of the Jewish community in Buenos Aires in Argentina. It was the second time that terrorists had struck this Jewish community. The first time around we rationalized and we said it was only the Israeli Embassy. That's Middle East politics.

But this time it was not only aimed at the Jewish community of Argentina, but at the non-Jewish community as well. The tactics of the terrorists of today have absolutely no regard for life or limb, nor for nationality. Innocent individuals who happened to be there, and those working on behalf of the community were struck down within a few seconds.

Terrorists struck twice in London after a plane was blown up in Panama. How ironic that many stayed away from Israel this year because they were concerned about security and decided to vacation elsewhere. But their sought-after sense of security was shattered by these dastardly acts.

As tragic and heart-wrenching as these incidents were, there was something else even more devastating — the lack of public reaction by both the Jewish and general community throughout the world. There were the normal and expected condemnations of terrorism, but by and large we failed to see the ordinary citizen on the street getting out to demonstrate and protest against terrorism which threatened everyone.

When faced with the reality that terrorism is not restricted to a particular area but can be unleashed anywhere, it is as if we have reconciled ourselves to this new fact of life.

Rather than insist that our various governments establish a policy of zero tolerance for terrorism and terrorists, we have placed great emphasis on locking our doors and putting up our own walls in an attempt to protect ourselves. The truth is, regardless of how high the walls and how many locks we have on the door, a terrorist bent on destruction and havoc against innocents will find a way.

It is far better to isolate the terrorist and terrorism than to retreat behind closed doors. It was if we were prepared to play victim and believe we are guilty of something; yet even a hint in that direction is to hand terrorism a victory.

The door of the year 5755 awaits our entry. How will the coming year be different from the year that is coming to a close?

The potential difference can be summarized by the story of an artist who was commissioned to paint a masterpiece for the king.

The artist was renowned for his skill and everyone awaited with great anticipation the unveiling of his great work of art. The day finally arrived when the canvas was to be unveiled. All gathered in the king's chambers to witness this epic event. The cover was finally lifted to reveal a beautiful painting of a huge door. It was magnificent in all of its detail and color.

As they examined the painting, they noticed that something was missing. The door was there, but the artist had neglected to paint in the handle. Finally someone drew up enough courage to ask the artist about the obvious omission of this crucial part of the door.

Said the artist: "I can present you with the door, but each individual must find their own handle so as to enter."

And so it is with the coming year. The door stands ready. How far we open it and what we do after we enter depends upon each and every one of us — not only upon the State of Israel or the community leader. Each and every one of us can make the coming year in our own communities and in our own homes and personal lives a little better, a little brighter a bit more fulfilling.

This we do by finding the handle and opening the door for ourselves, as opposed to waiting for others to open it for us. This in essence is the challenge of Rosh Hashanah.

Besides the public outing to the synagogue, there is also a time for private and personal commitments so as to make a difference. May these personal deeds help open the door to not only a Shanah Tovah but a Shnat Tikvah V'Shalom.

Rabbi Mordechai E. Zeitz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

Jewish constable complains of abuse

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A London constable who converted to Judaism has brought a complaint against the Metropolitan Police, alleging he was the victim of abuse by fellow officers.

The case will serve as a test case to determined whether a convert to Judaism is protected by laws against racial discrimination.

Paul Thomas alleges that he has been the victim of abuse by fellow police, and that anti-Semitism has blocked his promotion.

But according to legal advisers for the constable, the Metropolitan Police is arguing that as a convert, Thomas is not Jewish by ethnic origin and therefore not covered by existing legislation.

A preliminary hearing scheduled for Aug. 30 will consider whether Thomas is legally entitled to lodge a claim of racial discrimination.

Thomas, 38, converted to Judaism in Israel in 1978 after working on a kibbutz. He returned to England with his Israeli wife, Dina, in 1980 and joined the Metropolitan Police.

IRB decision ignores Israel's democratic nature

By DAVID MATAS

Recent decisions by Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) allowing Israelis to claim refugee status here undermine the credibility of our generous refugee policy and fail to take into account the democratic nature of Israel.

In 1993 the Board recognized 157 persons from Israel as refugees. In the first three months of 1994 the Board recognized 90 Israelis as refugees.

Most of the Boards granting Israeli claimants refugee status are located in the Montreal area. In 1993, 108 of the 157 claims accepted came from the Quebec region. Two hundred and three claims were rejected. In Ontario, by contrast, only 44 such Israeli claims were accepted and 508 rejected. In all the other provinces five claims were accepted and 18 rejected. The acceptance rate was about one in three in Quebec compared to one in 12 for the rest of Canada; an Israeli refugee claimant has four times as great a likelihood of being accepted in Quebec as in the rest of the country.

The acceptance of hundreds of refugees is linked to the arrival of thousands. In 1992 there were 2,050 Israeli cliamants. In 1993 there were 886, and in the first three months of 1994 there were 336.

The typical claiment is a recent immigrant from the former Soviet Union to Israel. On leaving the Soviet Union he or she may have claimed to be Jewish to take advantage of Israel's Law of Return; may have been an ethnic Jew who had converted to Christianity; or may have been part of a mixed-marriage couple. The typical grounds for claiming refugee status from Israel are that the immigrant was a victim of a crime such as a beating or rape, and that the police showed indifference to the crime.

Yet Israel is a democratic country with an independent judiciary. None of the international human rights organizations report violations of the human rights of the recent Soviet immigrants to Israel. The disproportionately high rate of success of these claims in Montreal discredits Canada's refugee system. Both the government of Canada and the immigration system need to revise their procedures. And although both the government and the administration of the IRB are limited in their powers since IRB members arrive at their decisions independently, there is nonetheless much that can be done.

Specifically the IRB can produce documentation to inform its members about the situation in Israel. To a certain extent this has already been done in a report produced in February 1993 entitled Israel: Jews from the Former Soviet Union published by the IRB's Documentation, Information and Research Bureau. However this report does not cover the specific population of Israeli immigrants now succeeding in winning refugee status in Canada, e.g., Soviet emigres with a Christian connection. More information on this group is needed.

As well the IRB needs to organize training sessions for its Montreal members about Israel; one such session was planned for this month.

Once the emigres arrive in Canada our government is far from helpless. It has the power by law to intervene in the IRB's cases; the question is, what should be the basis of this intervention?

Perhaps the best way to respond to this question is by asking another. Why does the IRB not recoginze claims from the United States? The typical U.S. claim resembles a standard Israel claim; that is, assertion that police cannot protect the immigrant from criminals. In 1993 there were 20 U.S. claims. All were rejected.

According to Canadian refugee law the IRB must distinguish between democratic and non-democratic countries. It must presume that the government of any country is able and willing to protect its citizens. If the claimant is from a non-democratic country this presumption is easily rebutted. However if the claimant comes from a country with a democratic government and an independent judiciary, evidence to counter this presumption would only be forthcoming in exeptional circumstances.

Canadian courts have also accepted the principle that no democratic country can guarantee the protection of its citizen at all times. When a democratic government is in effective control of its territory and makes serious efforts to protect its citizens, then the mere fact that it is not always successful in doing so will not justify a claim to refugee status.

It is this presumption of democracy that is applied to deny refugee claims from the United States. It is the failure to apply this democratic presumption to Israel that explains the unusually high acceptance rate to Soviet emigres from Israel arriving in the Montreal area.

But this failure points to a solution. Refugee hearing officers, IRB employees who participate in hearings on behalf of the Board, and Government representatives as well if necessary, should be intervening in these cases, not necessarily to delve into the facts of individual cases but to remind the Board of the law of democratic presumption and the facts about democracy in Israel.

The Israeli government has protested to Canada about recognition of Israeli claims by the Immigration and Refugee Board. Immigration Minister Sargio Marchi has said that foreign governments should not tell Canada who qualifies as a refugee. Marchi's earlier comparison of Israel to Iraq was indeed outlandish and later retracted. However the Government of Canada must be concerned when our refugee system goes off the rails, no matter what a foreign government may state. While Canadians have a right to be proud of our humane refugee policies, if the process is producing a large number of suspect decisions in the case of Israeli refugees, then public confidence in the system is eroded and all refugees suffer.

Autonomy for Israeli Arab citizens?

By CARL ALPERT

There is no doubt how the Arabs of Gaza and Jericho feel about their autonomy status, which to them is the state of Palestine, with Yasser Arafat as its president. There is no doubt that the Arab residents of Judea and Samaria consider that they are merely awaiting their turn to join the state. But what are the feelings of Israeli Arabs?

The recent Jerusalem Film Festival included the showing of a documentary film, in Arabic and made by an Israeli Arab, which sought to answer that question.

The setting of the picture, which is entitled Independence, is a small Arab village near Nazareth, on Israel Independence Day. What do the residents of the village feel as they fly Israel's blue and white flag on the national holiday?

The camera pans into a school room, as the teacher asks the children what the Israel flag means to them. "I'd like to burn it," one child replies. Another says she feels joy when she sees the Palestine flag, but sorrow at sight of the blue and white.

The head of the local council, who orders the flag displayed throughout the village, is dismissed as a traitor and quisling because he hobnobs with Israeli officials.

The author/director of the film, Nazar Hassan, elaborated his feelings and his intentions in a talk with Avner Bernheimer, of the daily Maariv. First of all, he rejected identification as an "Israeli Arab." Instead, he said, "We are Palestinians, citizens of Israel, and as Palestinians we cannot fly the Israeli flag." To him, Israel Independence Day marks the day when the Palestinians lost their national identity.

The hour-long film clearly reflects its maker's view as a rebel against Israeli domination over its Arab citizens. "I'm sick and tired of reading what Israelis write about us, though it is important to know what the enemy thinks about you."

He is critical of Israeli liberals who "try to make up to me." He detests what he calls their hypocrisy, their patronizing attitude, as if they are doing the Palestinians a favor. Stop being so arrogant, he tells them. Unfortunately, there are some Palestinians who love to toady up to these liberals.

It should be of more than passing interest to note that the picture, which won a prize at the Jerusalem Film Festival, was financed with Jewish money, produced by a Jewish company, and edited by a Jewish professional. All liberals, no doubt.

Hassan seeks to avoid speaking Hebrew wherever possible, and converses with Israelis in English. Asked if he envies the Palestinians in the territories "who know who they are," he replied: "We, too, know who we are, but the Palestinians here are not yet ready to say so."

A concerned observer might find that a foreboding observation, but there are already numerous indications of what is yet to come — indications that most Israelis choose to ignore.

It was not lost upon the Arabs of Israel that, in his Gaza speech, Arafat made it clear that when speaking of the ultimate liberation of all of Palestine he was referring not only to Hebron, Nablus, Bethlehem, Jenin and other towns in the West Bank, but also to Jerusalem, and most significantly, to the Negev and the Galilee as well.

There are other voices joining in the same chorus. The paper Maariv warns that an Israeli like Ahmed Tibi, who until recently was recognized by the government as a go-between with Arafat, is sowing the seeds of autonomy among Israeli Arabs when he proclaims that Ezer Weizmann is the president of his country and Arafat is the president of his people.

Arab Knesset member Tawfik Zayyad, recently killed in a car crash, stressed the importance of unity between Israeli Arabs and the Palestinians. He said: "Our unity is important to secure our liberty and peace." Choice of the word "liberty" was no accident.

A recent issue of the English-language New Middle East boldly carries an article by Prof. Said Zaydani in which he outspokenly looks forward to autonomy for the Palestinians living in Israel. He pictures the ideal situation in the area with three political entities existing side by side west of the Jordan. The state of Israel, the state of Palestine, and an autonomous area for the Arabs of Israel.

Ominous winds are blowing through the country.

PLO angered by Jordan's future role in Jerusalem

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

"Let them argue for a hundred years." This was the spirited though off-the record comment offered recently by a senior Israel policy-maker and — pronounced political dove — in response to reports of ongoing tension between Jordan and the Palestine Liberation Organization in the wake of the Israeli-Jordanian summit in Washington last month.

This official, like other well-placed Israelis, does not deny that the thought of "driving a wedge" between Jordan and the PLO did indeed cross the minds of Israeli decision-makers during the recent, hectic weeks in which the Washington Declaration with Jordan took shape.

But the belief that Israeli policymakers both anticipated and are pleased by this inter-Arab friction is a far cry from the theory, aired by some commentators in the region and abroad, that Israel may be seeking to displace the PLO with Jordan in the ongoing peace process.

To a certain degree, a wedge has indeed been driven: The Palestinians have been angered by a paragraph in the declaration in which Israel recognized Jordan's special role as guardian of Muslim holy places in Jerusalem.

In the Washington Declaration, which officially ended 46 years of conflict between Israel and Jordan, Israel agreed to give "high priority to the Jordanian historic role" at these Muslim holy shrines during the final-status negotiations on the territories that are scheduled to begin in two years.

But PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat continues to insist that his organization, which he regards as the harbinger of an eventual Palestinian state, should have primacy over both the Muslim and Christian holy places in Jerusalem.

Clearly disturbed by the developments, Arafat has called for immediate negotiations with Israel on the status of Jerusalem.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, citing the Declaration of Principles signed last September in Washington, stated in turn that the Jerusalem issue was not to be the subject of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations until two years after the implementation of self-rule in the Gaza Strip and West Bank district of Jericho.

But chief Palestinian negotiator Nabil Sha'ath responded that the declaration of principles explicitly stated that the final-status negotiations, which include the issue of Jerusalem, should begin "as soon as possible and not later than the beginning of the third year" from the start of Palestinian self-rule.

As Israeli and Palestinian officials traded their disagreements about the timing for Jerusalem negotiations, the Palestinians and Jordanians were engaged in delicate diplomacy designed to defuse growing tensions over this potentially explosive issue.

At the same time, it is apparent that Israeli leaders recognize the importance of dealing with Arafat and the Palestinians.

"Arafat is the partner," Rabin stated repeatedly during his triumphant trip to Washington to sign the Washington Declaration.

He may not have stated this with relish, and he indeed was, as everyone who witnessed the summit ceremonies thought, more comfortable with Hussein than he had been with Arafat last September.

But personal comfort is not the realistic criterion.

Neither Rabin nor any other major player on the Israeli side is seriously contemplating any prospect of dislodging the PLO in favor of Jordan as Israel's negotiating partner in the future stages of Palestinian self-government.

Rabin, despite his lack of relish, does daily diplomatic business with Arafat, and meets with the PLO chief from time to time when the need arises.

He has not changed his core belief, voiced countless times since September, that the success of the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians will depend ultimately on the PLO's success in gradually taking hold of the reins of government in the territories.

Jordan's place in that scheme is, at most, peripheral during the five-year transitional period. But it could become more central when the final status of the territories — and their relationship with Jordan — is negotiated.

Just as Rabin has not encouraged any myopia regarding the realities on the ground, so, too, the Israeli public harbors no illusions.

While it is true — as the polls show — that the agreement with Jordan enjoys much wider popularity than the agreement with the PLO, it is equally true that no one seriously denies the interdependency of the two agreements.

Israelis, of whatever political stripe, understand that Hussein would not — and perhaps could not — have moved toward the Washington Declaration until the Palestinian problem had been addressed in the Declaration of Principles and in the subsequent agreements for implementing Palestinian autonomy.

This is not to say that the breakthrough with Jordan has not occasioned a great deal of historical soul-searching.

Both in the Labor Party and in Likud there is much quiet thinking about what might have been had Israel reacted differently to various diplomatic opportunities that were presented in the past.

These include former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's proposal for a separation of forces agreement with Jordan in 1974 (which was rejected by Rabin, who was prime minister at the time) and the Hussein-Peres "London Agreement" of April 1987 on terms for an international peace conference (which was foiled by then-prime minister, Yitzhak Shamir of Likud).

Following the 1974 rejection by Rabin, the Arab world resolved at a summit conference to recognize the PLO as sole representative of the Palestinians. And not long after the 1987 episode, the Palestinian uprising broke out.

In retrospect, political leaders believe, there may well have been missed opportunities.

But historical hindsight, like personal comfort, is not the stuff of practical, here-and-now policy-making, they say.

The "Jordanian option," long advocated by senior Israeli leaders from both major parties as an alternative to dealing with the PLO, is dead. The current negotiations with Jordan, which deal with everything but the Palestinians and the territories, are the most cogent proof of that.

The Jordanian-PLO strains over Jerusalem are useful and convenient for Israel — particularly because of the seemingly intractable deadlock between Israel and the PLO over the future of the city.

A poor start

The recent closing of the Gaza newspaper Al-Nahar and the expulsion of Jerusalem journalist Daoud Kuttab from the daily Al-Quds — both ordered by Yasser Arafat — have been greeted in various Palestinian circles with shock, disappointment and fear. The latter commodity seems to be prevailing as Arab journalists in Gaza, Jerusalem and the territories choose a discreet silence as their expression of valor.

The closure of Al-Nahar is merely the latest in a series of police state tactics which Arafat has instituted in Gaza.

One of the most egregious examples of the PLO's despotic rule is the setting up of four different layers of secret security police to ensure Arafat's absolute control over Palestinians. A Gazan lawyer, Youssef Haddad, told Reuters, the international news agency, that Palestinian police have spread a climate of fear over Gazans through their use of abuse and torture.

It is interesting to note that apologists for Arafat explain away his closing down of Al-Nahar as an example of "misplaced pride" by a man who has onerous political burdens to bear.

Sheer sophistry: a free press, as Alexander Solzhenitzsyn once said, "is a kind of second government." Dictators and tyrants brook no opposition from alternate political visions. The way of Arafat is the way of thuggery and intimidation. The habits of the terrorist die hard.

These development do not bode well for the future of Gaza and Jericho. Arafat and his representatives constantly decry the lack of financial and business support for his Palestinian enterprises; yet what investor in his right mind would want to plow money into a government that shows every sign of transforming itself into another Mideast oligarchy?

Carlos the terrorist

He is a burned-out case — a mythical figure who forged his credentials as a terrorist in a skein of cold-blooded murders, a blundered assassination attempt, a celebrated hostage-taking incident, and a series of cowardly bombings. Now, following his sudden arrest in Sudan, he sits gloomily in a French prison, having been abandoned and betrayed by his former sponsors.

Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, otherwise known as Carlos the Jackal, was at once an icon of Marxist revolution and an emblem of Palestinian rejectionism of Israel. Today, awaiting a much-anticipated trial, he is revealed as a middle-aged anachronism whose time has passed.

Carlos was in his heyday in the 1970s and early 1980s, when the Soviet Union existed, when Moscow and Washington were locked in an increasingly bitter super power rivalry, and when peace in the Middle East seemed like a remote possibility. He exploited these factors brilliantly, and when danger loomed, he slipped through the cracks adeptly and found a safe haven in Moscow, Budapest, Sofia, Baghdad, Saana, Damascus or wherever else.

Carlos, who has been linked to the deaths of 83 people, including 15 in France, lost his legendary allure — as well as his protectors — with the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, the demise of the Soviet Union, the end of the Cold War, the defeat of Iraq in the 1991 Gulf War, the rapprochement between Israel and the PLO and the decision by Syria to commit itself seriously to the Madrid peace process.

With these events, Carlos became a liability, an embarrassment to regimes which had once hailed and embraced him. It is instructive that his cover was blown by Sudan, an Islamic fundamentalist nation which is still on a U.S. State Department list of countries sponsoring terrorism. And it is revealing that Syria, where he had apparently resided undisturbed for the past eight years, rolled up the welcome mat. In short, Carlos had outlived his usefulness, having been reduced to a freelance terrorist whose clients had deserted him one by one.

Carlos, of course, revelled in his media-driven image as a glamorous figure. In reality, he was something of a bungler. He botched a perfect opportunity to murder Joseph Edward Sieff, the Jewish merchant/philanthropist. And, like the gang that couldn't shoot straight, he fired a rocket-propelled grenade at a Yugoslav aircraft, missing his intended target, an El Al plane, by a wide margin.

All the while, Western intelligence agencies and journalists gave Carlos far too much credit than he actually deserved, thereby quixotically embellishing his dubious reputation. Contrary to the facts, he did not plan, or take part in, the Munich massacre of 11 Israeli Olympic athletes. Nor was he a participant in the Entebbe hijacking. Carlos was implicated in other events, mainly callous bombings claiming innocent lives. Yet when his record is examined carefully, the mystique he generated falls away.

He appeared to be larger than life, but he was an adventurer with feet of clay.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

POLISH JEWS IN ARMY

Most readers may have been surprised to read the article in your July 28 edition, "Polish Jews fought alongside gentile comrades in World War II." As a result, a recently published book may be of interest.

Entitled Jewish Military Casualties in the Polish Armies in World War II, subtitled Jewish Soldiers and Officers of the Polish People's Army Killed and Missing in Action, it lists the name, place and date of birth, rank, date of death, and the military operation. For anyone with relatives in Poland during those horrible years, this may be of general interest and, perhaps, has information about a relative that was heretofore unknown.

This 100-page book is Volume I of a series of three and was published by the Association of Jewish War Veterans of the Polish Armies in Israel, 158 Dizengoff, 63461 Tel Aviv. Volume II, Jewish Military Casualties in Polish Armies, West is schedule to be published in January 1995. This will be followed in 1996 by Volume III, Jewish Officers Murdered in Katyn. The books are in English.

APPROVES DARING SCENARIO

Re: your August 11 editorial, "A daring scenario," I would like to congratulate The CJN for keeping alive some ideas which existing Jewish organizations are loathe even to consider. Israeli deputy foreign minister Yossi Beilin has touched some very raw nerves by daring to ask basic questions about Jewish continuity, modern Zionism, the nature of the relationship between Diaspora Jews and Israel, and (perhaps the most delicate) what should happen to the hundreds of millions of dollars raised annually by the Jewish communities around the world.

Should Israeli leaders listen to "Zionists" from other countries, when these "Zionists" fail to make aliyah themselves? Should Diaspora Jews have to follow the lead of Israel in political or religious matters, or can they make decisions themselves? (Don't forget — even including biblical times — Jews have a longer history of existence outside Israel than within it.) Should large sums of money raised by Jewish communities worldwide continue to go to development projects in Israel, or is it more important now to use the funds for local needs?

For example, although I agree that the issues of anti-Semitism, hate propaganda, Arab terrorism, and prosecuting former Nazis are important, I believe that the issue which is far and away the most critical for the future of world Jewry is continuity. To most young people growing up today, religion is immaterial to their lives. If we truly believe that Judaism has something to offer, then we must find ways to let them know what they are missing. With all respect to the maturity level of today's pre-teens, I do not believe that a few months of bar or bat mitzvah lessons provide the opportunity to understand their heritage and Jewish values.

Mr. Beilin has suggested a combination of improved Jewish education (carrying on into the critical teen years), as well as a trip to Israel, as methods to make Judaism more meaningful on a personal level.

There are many other aspects of his comments worth pursuing. I don't know whether Mr. Beilin has the right answers, but his comments are certainly worthy of debate (instead of being ridiculed and swept under the rug).

TRANSNISTRIA AND HOLY DAYS

The group of Transnistria survivors formed this summer in Toronto sees as one of its goals raising community awareness about Transnistria (see The CJN June 23, "Transnistria — the forgotten cemetery").

We are respectfully asking that all rabbis of all congregations help us in this goal and include Transnistria during yizkor and commemoration services along with the names of the other extermination camps. Omitting the name Transnistria on such occasions is painful to us, the survivors, and we feel that the memory of our loved ones who perished is not being suitably acknowldeged.

We thank you for your cooperation. Shanah tovah, chatimah tovah to all.

ILL-ADVISED JUNKET

I was interested to read in your August 4 edition, that the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) sponsored a week in Israel for seven Bloc Quebecois MPs and that they sponsor one or two trips a year for parliamentarians to Israel. One would think the CIC could find better use for their money rather than paying for such junkets of members of a party that wants to break up Canada.

It was also disturbing to read on the same page that Thomas Hecht, the chair of the CIC, stated publicly that he considers an independent Quebec a "legitimate option." This runs contrary to the general feeling of the Quebec Jewish community, as was expressed by the Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region. Mr. Hecht's statement was given prominence in the French press. One has to wonder if Mr. Hecht was speaking for himself or on behalf of the CIC?

THE WRONG TARGET

One of the oldest tricks used by the sly politician when the public vehemently disagrees with him, is the use of diversionary tactics. When over a quarter of a million Jews protested in Jerusalem against Rabin's warm welcome of the terrorist Arafat, this present prime minister had to mollify the negative intense feeling against his persona by the cheap-shot of deflecting the public's attention toward a bogeyman, Rabbi Hirsh. For three days government sources fed the international news agencies with the "important" news of Hirsh's friendship, hand-shake, huggings . . . with the terrorist. Let us remember the truths:

Fact — the first who reached out to shake the bloody hand, was Rabin.

Fact — by doing so months ago, he made the animal "kosher." Hirsh only followed his footsteps.

It is a pity that some of your intelligent readers vent anger through their letters to you, at the fly, Rabbi Hirsh, rather than at the real culprit, Rabin.

There are Jews who don't want their boys circumcised

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

A generation ago the majority of Canadian and American doctors and hospitals suggested to the family of a newborn boy — even if he was not Jewish — to have him circumcised. The procedure was considered medically advisable for the boy and was also said to reduce the incidence of vaginal cancer in the future female partner.

Jews were not surprised; they had always thought that circumcision was not only obligatory for Jews but good for anyone who wanted to follow our ways.

Unfortunately, this sentiment also strengthened the belief of many Jews that circumcision was primarily a medical operation and they began to pay less attention to its religious implications. That kind of sentiment was parallel to the kind of feeling that abstaining from pork was good not because it was forbidden in the Torah, but because it diminished the incidence of trichinosis.

Rabbi Plaut

From the traditional point of view, this is of course putting things upside down. The rite of circumcision is the sign of the Covenant and not primarily a health measure. The Jewish adherence to the obligation of brit milah has not been, and is not dependent on, its presumed medical benefits.

Therefore, when about 10 years ago certain objections were raised in medical circles about the advisability of circumcision, it did not affect the vast majority of Jews. But there have been some who have let themselves be persuaded that this latest medical opinion is the real truth. Some time ago Moment magazine published articles on this issue and gave space to the anti-circumcision movement. This caused Rabbi Gilbert Kollin to write a letter entitled: Is picketing the mohel next? Moment even published the letter of one anti-circumcision advocate who said that he would not mourn the assassination of certain pro-circumcision authors. (I suppose he also approved of the Iranian death sentence for Salman Rushdie.) A recent talk show, I am told, had someone equate male circumcision with female circumcision as "genital mutilation."

In the United States, embroiled as the nation is in a discussion of reforming the national health program, the president's wife is receiving lots of mail not only about abortion but also about circumcision. Opponents of both demand that tax payers should not be asked to support such "criminal" procedures. Headquarters for the anti-circumcision movement are located, to no one's surprise, in California.

So far, the anti-circumcision movement has had no impact upon the Jewish observance of brit milah. In order to keep it that way it is essential to repeat time and again that brit milah and circumcision are not identical. The latter is a purely surgical matter, the former is a sacred ritual that has been with us since the days of Abraham. It is a prayerful act which draws God, tradition and hope into one large unbreakable circle.

Doubts about Zhirinovsky's influence surface

By LISA GLASER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Whether he's throwing a punch in the Russian Parliament, spitting at Jewish demonstrators in France or relaxing half-naked in a Slovenian sauna, Vladimir Zhirinovsky has generated a lifetime's worth of attention since his victory in the legislative elections in Moscow seven months ago.

But besides the splashy headlines and outlandish antics, how much of a threat does the ultranationalist pose to Russia's fledgling democracy — and to Russia's Jewish community?

Not much, say a surprising number of community leaders and others.

"Today, not many people consider him a serious figure," said Michael Chlenov, the president of the Va'ad, the federation of Jewish institutions in Russia. "I never considered him a threat."

"He is losing his glamor, we know all his gimmicks already," added Tankred Golenpolsky, the editor of the Jewish Gazette newspaper. "In perspective, I don't think Zhirinovsky is an important figure."

Alla Gerber, a Jewish deputy in the Duma, the lower house of the Russian Parliament, had this observation of her combative colleague: "People voted for him as a prophet, but now he is too close, you can touch him.

"The popularity of Zhirinovsky in the Duma and among the population in general is falling now," she said.

Still, even if Zhirinovsky is starting to suffer from overexposure, some of his ideas are taking hold.

As an ultranationalist, Zhirinovsky believes that the former republics of the Soviet Union should return to the welcoming arms of "Mother Russia," and he defends the honor of his beleaguered homeland by attacking ethnic minorities inside Russia as well as Westerners, Americans and CIA agents.

'Not many people consider him a serious threat'

These views are well-known and extreme, but watered-down versions are now becoming commonplace in a country reeling from economic hardship and longing for the stability and glory of Greater Russia.

In recent elections, Belarus and Ukraine voted for presidential candidates calling for closer relations with Russia. In addition, President Boris Yeltsin's rhetoric has taken a decidedly pronationalist slant in the last few months.

"Zhirinovsky is an ice breaker," explained Yevgeni Proshechkin, the head of the Moscow Anti-Fascist Centre. "It's not that he is harmful by himself, but he brings harmful ideas into the national consciousness."

Yet Zhirinovsky's ideas about Jews do not seem to have entered mainstream politics. Anti-Semitism has not increased enormously, and emigration to Israel is even dropping slightly.

Regarding Jews, Zhirinovsky is on record with a litany of bizarre statements.

At a news conference after the December elections, where his party won a quarter of the seats in the Duma, he blurted out that anti-Semitism is provoked by "those who consider themselves a part of the Jewish nation. We don't need provocations like this."

During a visit to France in April, he spoke of the "Jewification" of Paris. In addition, he has called Israel "the richest country in the world."

Yet experts here say far-right extremists such as Alexander Barkoshov, a neo-Nazi who helped lead the violence during the uprising at the Parliament last fall, are a much greater threat.

"Maybe Zhirinovsky makes occasional anti-Semitic statements, but it's not a part of his doctrine," said Vladimir Schapiro, a sociologist at the Russian Academy of Sciences. "Zhirinovsky's anti-Semitism is not a phobia; it's a game he plays consciously to get popularity among some part of the electorate."

Complicating the issue now is the question of Zhirinovsky's own lineage.

In April, an Associated Press reporter trekked out to Almaty, then the capital of Kazakhstan, where Zhirinovsky was born. There he discovered that Zhirinovsky's mother had been married to a Jewish man, Volf Eidelshtein, and that the ultranationalist had been known as Eidelshtein until he was 18 years old.

Zhirinovsky dismissed the reports as a "fabrication" and a "forgery," but the allegations have stuck, especially since Israeli officials have since stated that he once requested an invitation to emigrate to Israel. Moreover, Russian Jewish leaders say he was briefly involved in a Jewish cultural organization called Shalom.

Golenpolsky of the Jewish Gazette said Zhirinovsky recently wrote a letter to him and spoke to him personally in an attempt to deflect attention from the alleged Jewish connections.

But the damage control effort was pointless, Golenpolsky observed, noting that Zhirinovsky's attempts to appeal to Russia's latent anti-Semitism have backfired.

"Even if the time comes for the nation to put up a pro-Nazi leader, they would always remember that Zhirinovsky's father is Jewish," he said. "This they will not forget."

In fact, this ironic twist to the Zhirinovsky story has become legend here, popping up in discussions and winding its way into television comedy shows and the state Duma.

After an especially rabid speech by Zhirinovsky, Yuly Gusman, a Jewish deputy from the reformist Russia's Choice party, attempted to defuse the tension with a joke: "Vladimir Volfovich," he said, "I'm talking to you as one Orthodox Christian to another."

Yet this sort of banter is rare in the new Duma, which, in its first seven months, has distinguished itself as an excellent forum for fist fights and shouting matches and a very poor place to pass laws.

The institution is still potentially important, but only within limits because under the new Russian constitution, power is heavily weighted toward Yeltsin.

Whether Zhirinovsky and his party cohorts will exert real influence there remains to be seen. In the meantime, he continues to barnstorm the country in a never-ending campaign for the presidential election of 1996.

The headquarters of his Liberal Democratic party are a dilapidated four-story building in central Moscow, one floor above a store selling heavy-metal cassettes, leather jackets, scarves — decorated with pictures of marijuana leaves — and stacks of the newspaper, Zhirinovsky's Truth.

Outside the party office, elderly Russians sell photos of their leader, T-shirts, badges and a book on the Afghanistan war. The furniture in a waiting room looks like a thrift store bordello: a sagging red velvet settee, cracked linoleum on the floor, peeling paint on the walls, curtains from another era.

Requests for a formal interview are met with the response that it costs $5,000 for a 30-minute chat with Zhirinovsky, and that anyway, he is busy with a banquet at the Iraqi embassy. But the ultranationalist can still be nabbed at the Duma, where his strange behavior is on display free of charge.

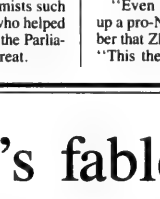
A New Year's fable for bi-peds

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

Two years ago, during the 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, Jerusalem resident Tuvia Chaim Arielwent to ask a shilah, a question, of a rabbi he deeply respects.

Ariel lost his right leg in an accident on a kibbutz some 27 years ago, a pivotal event in a life that had already included making aliyah (he used to be Terry Noble of the Bronx). In the years after he lost his leg, he became an observant Jew and studied at Yeshiva Aish Ha'Torah; married a wonderful woman from Yorkshire, England, with whom he now has five children; worked 15 years as Israel's only one-legged tour guide; opened a book store in Jerusalem; and started an important endeavor: the Jerusalem Institute for Rehabilitation (JIR), not a bad track record for a big, burly, dyslexic with a bushy beard, a roguish sense of humor, and a habit of referring to himself as a uni-ped and most of the rest of us as bi-peds.

The Jerusalem Institute for Rehabilitation is bringing the most modern American limb replacement techniques to Israel and has helped bring several Israelis to America for prosthetic limbs. Because Ariel and his wife support their five children and this charity out of the proceeds of their small bookshop plus whatever donations they can get, the JIR hasn't got much money. So far, it has recruited a young American-trained prosthetic technician who plans to make aliyah and help Ariel open a JIR prosthetic technology school in Jerusalem, as soon as there is enough money to get started.



Erica Meyer Rauzin

Two years ago Ariel decided that he needed to come to America to raise funds and to learn prosthetic technology himself. He is intimately acquainted with his own series of artificial legs, ranging from pretty good to terrible. He has been helped along the way by U.S. prosthetic experts who have donated their time, skills and materials, but he wanted to know how legs should and could be made, not only for Israel but for all the Middle East. "Why can't Israel be for legs what Switzerland is for watches?" he asks. "The need is there, the ability is there. Israel's genius lies in finding the best, learning it, and teaching it." So he set out to make it happen.

The question he asked his rabbi was, "Is it okay to leave Israel for this purpose in the New Year? Can I take my wife and my children to America for this, to stay a while, learn, fundraise and come back?"

"If you go with the commitment to come back, you can go," the rabbi told him. But it got harder than that. As Ariel drove home from the rabbi's house, his car skidded on a four-lane highway and crashed into a mountain side.

He nearly died. Today he has scars on both arms and metal screws in both hips. He still faces one more round of hip surgery to remove the metal. He is only free of pain when he floats in a swimming pool: any moment of weight-bearing hurts. "After 25 years as a healthy amputee immitating a cripple, now I am really a cripple," Ariel, now age 57, says today. "I spent the last two years in bed with a computer, learning to write with it, and learning how to use the worldwide information highway — which is right now a two-lane blacktop with a lot of potholes."

His purpose in writing and communicating was to continue the work of the JIR. When his strength flagged, he thought of two people: prisoner Jonathan Pollard, whose confinement helped Ariel contain his own impatience to be up and around again, and Udi, the small Israeli boy who had never walked until Ariel brought him to America and — with the help of a couple of pivotal donations — got him a leg. Now Udi runs and plays ball with his brothers. But little boys grow, and limbs made of plastic and steel do not. In a year or so, Udi will need another prosthesis from JIR. His mother, whom Ariel describes as "heroic," is a divorced shopkeeper with three children. She will never be able to afford the kind of high tech prosthetis that is best for Udi.

For today, he's doing great. On a recent videotape made to show his progress, Udi speaks only of wanting to stop filming and go get ice cream, not of running, because running has — at last — become as routine for him as it should be for every little boy.

It isn't always easy to face the holidays with optimism, so here is a new, hopeful, grateful, image for your Rosh Hashanah. Here is a story to remember as you cherish the daily miracles, such as standing up. Here is something to think about.

Think about Tuvia Chaim Ariel. Think about Udi, running, chasing a ball down a green hill in Jerusalem because a one-legged man wouldn't let anything keep him down.

Soviet Jews head for Germany

Reporting from Berlin, Bonn and Frankfurt, Sheldon Kirshner investigates how Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union have adapted to Germany.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Is history repeating itself?

It would seem so with respect to Soviet Jews settling in Germany.

On the heels of the pogroms in the Russian empire in the late 19th century, tens of thousands of harassed and persecuted Jews fled to Germany and re-established themselves there.

And now, in an intriguing historic process which bears a striking similarity to that exodus, Jews from the now-defunct Soviet Union are streaming into Germany once again.

Soviet Jews began arriving in the then-divided Germany in the 1970s, but the pace has picked up considerably since 1990, with the result that almost half of Germany's 43,000 registered Jews are of Soviet origin.

Nobody can really pinpoint the exact number of Soviet Jews here, nor do they know with any certainty how many of the new arrivals are halachically Jewish.

Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, cites a figure of 14,000 Soviet Jews, while Anita Kugler, a Berlin journalist whose specialty is Jewish affairs, speaks of 15,000 to 20,000. But who's to say that these statistics are accurate? Herbert Schnoor — the interior minister of the province of North-Rhine Westphalia — said last year that 43,000 Soviet Jews had entered Germany.

And the flow continues, even if one quibbles about the real numbers.

Yehiel Leket, the acting chair of the Jewish Agency of Israel, said recently that 4,000 to 5,000 Soviet Jews are expected to enter Germany annually for the next few years.

Robin Ostow, a Canadian-based sociologist who studies German-Jewish affairs, claims that immigration documents had been issued to 47,015 Soviet emigrants as of Dec. 31, 1992.

Bubis estimates that 68,000 Soviet Jews have applied for permission to live in Germany.

What seems clear is that the Jewish community in Germany — which was nearly decimated by the Nazis — will be strengthened and, community leaders hope, ultimately invigorated by the Soviet influx.

The Soviet presence is keenly felt in many Jewish communities, but nowhere more than in Berlin. Tatyana Korol, a Ukrainian-born social worker employed by the Central Welfare Organization of Jews in Germany, says that 7,000 out of some 10,000 registered Jews in the German capital are of Soviet descent. Jerzy Kanal, the lay leader of Berlin's Jewish community and originally a Polish Jew, claims that Soviet Jews comprise at least half of its Jewish population.

By sheer numbers alone, the new immigrants appear to have rejuvenated communities in such cities as Frankfurt, Hamburg, Magdeburg, Schwerin and Dusseldorf, while in Dortmund, Dresden and Braunschweig they have doubled the size of the existing communities. In several instances, notably in Reutlingen and Potsdam, they have been instrumental in starting new communities.

Korol, who arrived in Berlin five years ago, explains that the first substantial wave of Soviet immigrants reached Germany before unification in 1990.

Thousands of Soviets were absorbed by West Germany in the 1970s and 1980s. But as the Soviet Union and its ally East Germany disintegrated, many more Soviet Jews headed for East Berlin.

"Soviet Jews left on tourist visas or on the basis of invitations, and when they got to East Berlin, they were allowed to stay for humanitarian reasons," says Korol.

The first batch, who arrived in early 1990, were temporarily accommodated in barracks near East Berlin that had been used by the state security service. The Ministry of Interior paid for room and board.

When housing in East Berlin and environs was exhausted, the newcomers were sent to other localities in East Germany. "They were given a residential permit for five years, social welfare assistance and the right to free medical care," notes Korol.

Following German unification, new regulations for Soviet Jewish refugees came into force. Soviet Jews now have to apply to the German embassy in Moscow for an immigration permit, according to Susanne Spulbeck, a cultural anthropologist in Berlin who has done field work on Soviet Jewry.

In terms of legal status, there are three groups of Soviet Jews in Germany today. Quota refugees who were accepted because of their Jewish background. Immigrants who were reunited with family members. Jews from the Baltic states who claimed they were of German origin. As of last year, the largest group consisted of quota refugees.

Not many Soviet Jews reach Germany via Israel, says Korol. Several hundred, though, were admitted during the 1991 Gulf War.

The Soviets, she adds, are eligible for German citizenship after seven years, provided they have a work history of five years and are proficient in German. Personally, she is stateless, but will apply for citizenship in January 1995.

Soviet Jews in Germany receive a whole range of benefits: welfare assistance and medical care, rent subsidies, language instruction and university and vocational training education.

The Central Welfare Organization of Jews in Germany also provides aid, ranging from allowances to cover the cost of higher-priced kosher food to tuition stipends.

"They are also given help in finding flats and jobs and in threading their way through the German bureaucracy," says Korol. "And a nurse pays regular visits to old and sick people."

As well, Korol's organization tries to bring the Soviets closer to their Jewish roots. "Most are ignorant of Jewish tradition and culture," she points out. "But they're hungry for Jewish knowledge, and the community tries to draw them in."

Kugler, the reporter who writes about Jewish affairs for a Berlin daily, claims that less than 50 percent of the Soviets are halachically Jewish.

It is impossible to verify this claim, but Korol is certain that some of the Soviets who've passed themselves off as Jews are not actually Jews.

In any event, a significant number of Jews from the former Soviet Union here are not particularly interested in identifying with their Jewishness. For her part, Spulbeck believes that only one-third of the Soviets in Berlin have officially joined the Jewish community.

A high proportion of the Soviets are well educated and are white-collar professionals, at least by training. In a report released last year, the Moses Mendelssohn Centre in Potsdam disclosed that 24 percent of the immigrants were engineers and natural scientists; 12 percent were artists and cultural workers; 9 percent were doctors; 9 percent were teachers; 7 percent were economic researchers; 16 percent were administrators, and 18 percent were tradespeople.

With only an estimated 16 percent practising their professions, unemployment is by far the major obstacle to integration facing the immigrants.

Stefan Szajak, director of Frankfurt's Jewish community, is not sanguine that many adult immigrants will find jobs in their chosen fields. "Their professional credentials are not recognized, and they lack language skills."

And besides, says Korol, an employer is legally bound to offer employment to a German citizen first.

Apart from unemployment and language deficiencies, a scarcity of housing is the most daunting challenge facing the Soviets. "Just in Berlin, we have a shortage of 120,000 flats," observes Korol.

Few of the immigrants are preoccupied with the upsurge of neo-Nazi violence that has shaken Germany in the past few years. As victims of state-sanctioned anti-Semitism in the old Soviet Union, they are accustomed to patterns of prejudice — which the German government officially condemns and combats.

Korol, 48, left the former Soviet Union largely because, as a Jew, she felt like a second-class citizen.

"I had a nice flat, a car, a job. But I wasn't free. I could not travel abroad. I could not live a full life. And that was because I was a Jew."

She and her husband, a dentist, were also tempted by emigration because they feared that their son would be drafted into the Red Army and sent to fight in the war in Afghanistan.

The Korols applied for exit visas in 1979, when Cold War tensions were running high, but they were refused. Finally, they were given permission to go to Israel.

She visited Israel, and while she basically liked it, was put off by its Middle Eastern flavor. "I'm a European, and I wanted to remain in Europe," explains Korol, whose mother tongue is German.

With their visas for Israel in hand, the Korols left the former Soviet Union in March 1988. Finding themselves in Vienna, they opted for Germany after concluding that the gates to Canada and the United States were closed.

"I had no problem in adjusting to Germany," says Korol, a sprightly woman who served as Heinz Galinski's Russian interpreter. Until his death in 1992, Galinski was chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

Like Korol, virtually every Soviet Jew who has settled here has no intention of leaving. "Germany is not merely a stop-over point," says Kugler. "Most are here to stay."

Last April, the Jewish Agency launched a program to encourage emigration from Germany, focusing primarily on Soviet Jews. "There is a rise of racial incidents, including acts of anti-Semitism," said the chair of the Jewish Agency. "The present reality demands increased activity... to encourage aliyah from Germany."

The campaign is likely to fail. Despite all their problems, Soviet Jews basically want to remain in Germany. And while the Central Council of Jews in Germany does not encourage emigration to Germany, neither does that umbrella body discourage it.

As Bubis once said: "We're not soliciting people to come, but those who do come will be supported."

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Isaac Sidney Caesar, otherwise known as Sid Caesar to his legion of fans, was by all accounts the most brilliant comedian on television.

With his gift for mimicry, learned at his father Max's working-class luncheonette, Caesar was one of the dazzling bright lights of TV in its infancy.

Along with the likes of Milton Berle, Jack Benny, George Burns and Jack Carter, America's quintessential Jewish comics, Caesar entertained millions of viewers with his scintillatingly funny monologues.

Caesar, the subject of a recent A&E TV profile, Sid Caesar: Television's Comedy Genius, made his TV debut in 1949 with The Admiral Broadway Revue. That was followed by Your Show of Shows (1950-54), Caesar's Hour (1954-57), Sid Caesar Invites You (1958) and The Sid Caesar Show (1963-64). Later in his career, he appeared on stage and in nightclubs and movies. For the benefit of a younger generation unfamiliar with his work, Caesar reprised his routines in a series of videocassettes in the 1970s.

He was born on Sept. 8, 1922 in Yonkers, New York, an unlikely locale for a budding star. But it was there, in his father's lowly diner, that Caesar absorbed the Russian, German, Italian, French, Hungarian and Spanish accents and language rhythms that he would incorporate into his uproarious sketches.

There he was also introduced to the saxophone, which a customer had left behind. Caesar took to the instrument like a duck to water and, thanks to lessons paid for by his father, became an accomplished musician. While still in high school, he played at dances and weddings.

Continuing his musical education at the Julliard School of Music, Caesar meanwhile honed his talents as a saxophonist in hotels and casinos in the borscht belt of the Catskill Mountains.

Brilliant comedian

There, we're told, he discovered his lifelong calling — comedy. With his impromptu burlesque sketches, he found that he could make people laugh.

In 1942, he joined the U.S. Coast Guard, performing in stage reviews for service personnel. His most memorable show was Tars and Spa:s, in which he played several characters. Tars and Spars was so popular that it was transformed into a Hollywood movie in 1946.

Never looking back, Caesar starred in another film, The Guilt of Janet Ames, in which he played a nightclub comic. He then appeared in a Broadway revue, Make Mine Manhattan.

Sylvester (Pat) Weaver, the vice-president of NBC TV, liked what he saw and signed Caesar up as host of The Admiral Broadway Revue. The ratings were good, and Caesar was handed another plum, Your Show of Shows, which teamed him up with writers Neil Simon, Woody Allen, Carl Reiner, Larry Gelbart and Mel Brooks.

Success followed success, but there was a price to be paid. The pressure of churning out a live weekly show had its effect. As Brooks observes, "We had a lot of fun, but we also had nervous breakdowns."

Caesar began drinking and popping pills, and these addictions eventually derailed him and nearly ruined his family life. As he descended into alcoholism and drug abuse, he relied on his "residual" capabilities to make it through his comic routines. "I worked and I was there, but I really wasn't there," he wrote in his 1982 autobiography, Where Have I Been?

Before he hit rock bottom in 1978, Caesar went through the motions of making more movies, including It's A Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World, and TV specials and appearing in nightclub acts.

He reached his nadir one night on the dinner theatre circuit, to which he had been banished, when he couldn't remember his lines. The indignity of that spectacle was a catalyst for self-improvement. Caesar decided to reform himself, and by the early 1980s, he had recovered.

Since then, Caesar has been seen on cable TV and in several films. Today, nine years after his induction into the Television Hall of Fame, he is basically retired, but he remains an icon of show business.

AIDS cases anger Ethiopian Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Recent publicity over the number of AIDS cases among new Ethiopian immigrants apparently has fueled discrimination and angered the Ethiopian community, as well as public officials.

Israel Television recently aired a program focusing on the incidence of AIDS among the Ethiopians.

Of the country's 1,123 known AIDS carriers, 393 are Ethiopians, according to the Health Ministry.

But Ethiopian leaders, their advocates and government officials say the numbers are misleading and irresponsible.

First, all the Ethiopians have been tested for AIDS while the general Israeli public has not, said Ra'anan Har-Zahav, an attorney representing the Ethiopians. This makes it impossible to draw a meaningful comparison between the incidence of the disease among Ethiopians and among the rest of the population, he said.

Second, the number of actual AIDS carriers among the general public is estimated to be at least twice the number of known carriers, said Har-Zahav. The Health Ministry said it employs no such estimate.

But the Ethiopian immigrants are the only group in Israel that is universally tested, a spokeswoman at the Health Ministry confirmed. The policy was adopted by the government in 1991 because "we knew they came from an area which has a very large risk of carrying this illness," said Yifat Ben-Hay, the ministry's spokeswoman.

At the same time, fewer than 0.7 per cent of the Ethiopians are AIDS carriers, she noted.

Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban lashed out at what he called the irresponsibility of the media for reporting the story. He said it was wrong to publish the report about a single ethnic group because it automatically stigmatizes its members and could generate racism, said a spokeswoman.

Tsaban said that while the public has a right to certain information, that right must be weighed against the damage it may cause, and in this case the harm outweighed the benefit.

"The Ethiopian absorption is a test of honor for Israeli society and because of media competition, the absorption could be ruined," he said.

Two Ethiopian advocacy groups filed a petition with the High Court seeking an interim injunction against the Israel Television broadcast. They charged it would cause irreparable damage to the community's image.

Har-Zahav, who filed the petition on their behalf, argued that even the previews for the program had resulted in instances of discrimination. Native Israelis had removed their children from a camp with Ethiopian children at their caravan site near Haifa while Ethiopian children were barred from a nearby beach, he said.

The court ruled that it would not stop the broadcast but that the community must be given the chance to respond on television. An Ethiopian representative appeared and spoke at length on the program, which aired August 12.

Community to go on the air

The community also won the right to go on the air again shortly after schools reopen next month.

The Ethiopians want the opportunity to counter the damage they believe was done by the reports — damage they fear will show up in the classroom, said Har-Zahav.

Meanwhile, Jewish Agency Acting Chairman Yechiel Leket issued a statement last week saying that Israel had absorbed tens of thousands of Ethiopian immigrants and "no massive occurrences of serious diseases" were ever found among them.

He pointed to the more than 5,000 Ethiopian teens who study and live in Youth Aliyah villages and said, "Special health problems of public consequence were never encountered there."

Uri Gordon, head of immigration and absorption for the Agency, said the publicity does the Ethiopians an injustice because it is based on partial and faulty information.

The comprehensive medical examinations prove the number of people carrying the disease is "small and inconsequential," he said.

Egypt seeking better relations

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak informed Foreign Minister Shimon Peres in Alexandria last Wednesday that he wants to enhance ties with Israel.

With talks on Israeli-Jordanian cooperation taking shape, observers say Cairo wants to transform its 15-year chilly peace with Israel into a closer relationship.

According to officials traveling with Peres, Mubarak said he wanted to send two more Egyptian ministers to Israel before the end of the month. Egypt's oil minister visited here last week and was joined by working-level aides.

Mubarak told Peres during their two-hour meeting that the Egyptian science minister would arrive in Israel within the next few weeks to discuss academic exchanges between the two countries, thereby engaging one of the sectors most resistant to cooperation with Israel.

After the meeting, Peres went on to talks with a PLO delegation led by Nabil Shaath.

The Egyptian president also said he would encourage Egyptian editors to accompany Foreign Minister Amr Moussa on a two-day visit here before the end of the month, Israeli officials indicated.

Mubarak expressed interest in setting up a four-member development fund involving Egypt, Israel, Jordan, and Palestinians, should the Palestinians agree. Egyptian officials have privately complained that Cairo might be bypassed, as international money pouring into the Middle East may only go to Israel, Jordan, and the Palestinians.

In another development last week, Peres said Syria had given the go-ahead for a group of American Jewish leaders to visit Damascus.

According to Peres, Assad's reported assent to the visit by Jewish leaders was just one sign of the "positive atmosphere" between Israel and Syria, but he added there was still no breakthrough in efforts to bring the two sides to the negotiating table.

It is known that two dovish American Jewish groups, American Friends of Peace Now and Project Nishma, visited Syria this year.

O'Driscoll put on short leash

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Robert O'Driscoll, the University of Toronto professor accused of publishing anti-Semitic material and barred from the campus, will be allowed back into the classroom if he meets a number of conditions imposed by the university.

"The conditions he has to meet to be permitted to return in September are medical in nature to assure us he is fit mentally and physically," said Adel Sedra, vice-president and provost of the university.

Sedra said the university recently completed two separate reviews of O'Driscoll in the wake of complaints about the professor. One review centred on concerns raised last spring "where a number of staff members [and students] felt unsafe in his presence and intimidated by him."

The second focused on his academic qualifications in light of his published work, including The New World Order and the Throne of the Antichrist. That book has been condemned by many, including Canadian Jewish Congress, for repeating numerous anti-Jewish canards.

The reviews led the university to reprimand O'Driscoll and impose the conditions on him, Sedra said. If he refuses to comply, further discipline could be imposed, including suspension and perhaps even a recommendation to the university president that he be removed from the school.

Sedra said the professor's behavior has prompted "some concerns. We had a long series of incidents over five years, some of a bizarre nature," but no direct threats or assaults, he said.

The probe that looked into O'Driscoll's academic performance found that his two most recent books "have no bona fide scholarship. But we do not fire people because their writing is not good scholarship."

As a result of that investigation, "the university will not provide any support for him in the writing of such material" and it will not accept the books as fulfilling the requirements that he do research and publish works of scholarship, Sedra said.

Louis Lenkinski, chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said, "We are satisfied that the University of Toronto continues to deal with this matter seriously. We are obviously concerned any time a professor teaching at a university with the reputation of the University of Toronto has openly published anti-Semitic work."

Congress "remains concerned that the University of Toronto would have in its employ someone who publishes anti-Semitic falsehoods," Lenkinski added.

Na'amat Israel helps children.

Na'amat helps teenagers

In their 16 vocational high schools, Na'amat works with 2,000 adolescent under-achievers annually to bring out their full potential. And in their 839 day care units, Na'amat gives a head start to 25,000 pre-schoolers.

Among these are thousands of children from deprived environments whose day care is subsidized so that they can reach the same pre-school development levels as their more advanced peers. Many of the financial subsidies for both age groups are donated by The CJN readers and Na'amat suppporters in Canada.

The 1994-1995 Growing Up With Na'amat Campaign begins officially this week.

"This is one of the most crucial periods in all of Israel's short history," Rodzynek concluded. "The members of Na'amat and our supporters have a rare opportunity to give Israel's children the strength that they will need to deal with the challenges of Middle East coexistence."

This edition of The CJN includes a brochure outlining the projects that Na'amat provides for children.

Only in ... Israel — pity

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Queen Elizabeth II may have been surprised, even a little amused, if she noticed the hat a woman was wearing at a royal walkabout on the lawn of the Parliament Buildings, prior to the opening of the Commonwealth Games here.

The woman, standing in the front row of the crowds (about 10,000 were on hand), wore a sun hat similar to the type that used to be worn in the early days of the State of Israel on a kibbutz.

Printed in bold, black type on the white hat were the words: "Welcome to Israel."

A CBC cameraman closed up on her after the Queen had left, and reporter Ian Hanamansingh asked her if she had had a good look at the Queen. The woman said definitely yes . . . and that it was the second time she had seen Her Majesty.

Hanamansingh did not ask her to identify herself and went on to others in the crowd to get their opinions of the Royal visit and the Games.

But for about a minute, there it was: Welcome to Israel, which thousands may have seen on the network.

The woman may have been a tourist or perhaps a local — there was no way to find out. But the Israel Tourist Office should be happy about it!

Hamilton UJWF to get underway with Israeli choir

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hamilton's 1995 United Jewish Welfare Fund (UJWF) will get off to a rousing start on Oct. 1 with a concert by the renowned Israel Kibbutz Choir.

This will be the choir's only Canadian appearance during its forthcoming North American tour. The performance takes place at the Hamilton Convention Centre, at 8:30 p.m., and tickets at $10 per person can be obtained by calling the Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth & Area office at (905) 648-0605.

Composed of 50 members from kibbutzim throughout Israel and conducted by music director Avner Itai, the choir brings a repertoire of traditional Jewish, Israeli folk and classical pieces.

Meanwhile, campaign plans are getting underway.

Campaign co-chairs Dr. Cheryl Greenbaum and Dr. Rick Black have already been announced.

Also, Sandra Fuss and Cele Steinberg will serve as women's division co-chairs, with Lynne Czutrin as vice-chair; Jay State heads the lawyers' division; and CeCe Schreiber is in charge of new gifts.

Patricia Tolkin Eppel, Federation executive director, says that Hamilton United Jewish Appeal (UJA) is working on setting up a "telephone affinity" group.

Picking up on the enormous success of these groups, she points out, would mean that besides the benefit to subscribers of getting up to 40 per cent off on long distance calls and up to 25 per cent off on overseas calls, the UJA would benefit by 5 per cent.

"Whichever way you look at it," declares Tolkin Eppel, "it's a win-win situation."

New this year is the recent decision by the federation board to allocate half of all funds raised over and above last year's total to Jewish education.

The decision is sure to be welcomed. Jewish education has long been under funded and after all, observes Tolkin Eppel, education "touches virtually every family in the community."

The other half of any increase over last year's campaign total, she adds, will be designated to Israel.

Also new this year, is the challenge by an anonymous benefactor to match all first time gifts up to $50.

Another new incentive is a chance to win a specially commissioned painting by local artist Rhoda Katz by those who increase their donation by $50 or more.

The first item on the campaign calendar is a meeting on August 25 at the home of Dr. Franklyn and Rita Shapiro to introduce young doctors new to the community to long-time UJA supporters in the medical profession.

At Shabbat services on August 26 and August 27, there will be a special UJA presentation and kiddush at each of the three congregations, and Super Sunday, under chair Lynne Czurtin, is scheduled for Sept. 11, with further telethons to be held throughout the month.

And finally, Hamilton hopes to be the leading community in a UJA mission to Israel of smaller Ontario Jewish communities, Oct. 3 to 12.

Winnipeg CJA set to launch campaign

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) is kicking off its 1994-95 campaign on Sept. 1, at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue with an evening for the community.

Featured will be Maynard Wishner, president of the North American Council of Jewish Federations; internationally known entertainer Judith Lander; and a special mystery guest from Israel.

This is the third year in a row that the CJA has started its campaign with an evening for Winnipeg's Jewish community.

"We don't charge admission or solicit any money for the evening," says Jerry Koffman, the new CJA director. "Our aim is to raise not dollars this night but rather Jewish consciousness and awareness of what the CJA stands for. We want to show the community that the CJA is more than just an organization to which people write cheques."

The theme of the evening is Celebration and Simchah. It will begin with a dinner for top donors with Wishner, a Chicago lawyer and philanthropist. Wishner's major speech will be open to the entire community.

"He is a witty and engaging speaker filled with Yiddishkeit," Koffman says.

Following Wishner, several young Winnipeggers who have been on The March of the Living will talk about the journey and their experiences. They are an example of how CJA dollars and resources are spent, Koffman notes.

Former Winnipegger Lander has performed on Broadway and played Carnegie Hall. She was in the original Jacques Brel company and has staged several one-woman shows. She has also written an award winning song dedicated to the memory of Winnipegger Sara Udow, who founded the famed Chai Folk Ensemble.

Koffman reports the CJA will be screening a powerful new video from Israel that evening.

As for the identity of the guest from Israel, that will only be unveiled on the evening of Sept. 1.

Education seminar

TORONTO — Educator Selma Sage returned recently from a special seminar at the Melton Centre for Jewish Education in the Diaspora at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

She was one of 10 North American educators and rabbis to participate in the seminar which studied Peace and Conflict in the Bible, the Talmud and in Jewish philosophy.

Another participant was Florence Melton, a longtime American communal activist, philanthropist and supporter of Jewish education .

The Florence Melton adult mini-schools for Jewish education have been established in 22 centres, including one at the Toronto Institute for Jewish Studies housed at the Jewish Community Centre.

Reena Fun Day to feature activities and entertainment

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This year's Reena Fun Day offers a wide array of activities and entertainment.

Funds raised at the eighth annual all-day event, to be held at the Promenade Shopping Centre in Thornhill August 29, will support a room in the Reena Foundation's soon-to-be-built Toby and Henry Battle Centre.

The Reena Foundation is a non-profit agency dedicated to integrating developmentally handicapped adults into mainstream society.

Ground-breaking for the new building on Clark Avenue is scheduled for this fall.

City TV's Breakfast Television is scheduled to be on hand at Reena Fun Day from 7 a.m. until 8:55 a.m., but kick off is officially at 10 a.m., when free stage entertainment begins in the mall's Centre Court.

The stage lineup includes children's entertainer Jack Grunsky, Ronald McDonald, cast members of Crazy for You, the Beverly Segal Dancers, Singing Chef Pasquale, mentalist Mike Mandel, Three on Three celebrity basketball, and the capella singing group, The Simple Tones.

Cornilla Luna, star of Miss Saigon, will round out the stage show at 7 p.m., after which a gala auction will be held at 7:30.

The mayors of Vaughan, North York and Richmond Hill will be on hand for a noon-hour ceremony, as will council members and corporate sponsors like Cott Beverages.

Activities, including a Velcro wall, will be set up throughout the mall from 10 a.m. until late afternoon. Caricaturists, face painting, mini-circuit bike riding and carnival games are old favorites, while Virtual Reality: The Hockey Goalie is a new attraction.

At the Busy World of Richard Scarry, presented by Crayola and the Family Channel, youngsters can try new Crayola products and see animated videos by popular children's book author Richard Scarry.

Items donated for both the gala auction and a silent auction will be on display during the day. Sign-up for the 7:30 p.m. gala auction takes place one hour before the auction begins.

Last year's Reena Fun Day raised $150,000, said event chair Elaine Ross. Because outside funding has decreased, she explained, events such as the Fun Day — Reena's biggest public awareness event — are increasingly important.

Promenade merchants will donate a percentage of the day's sales to the Reena Foundation.

Ross and her volunteer committee of 40 have devoted an entire year to making the day a success. "It's a major undertaking, but it's fun. It's a very exciting day," she said.

Anyone wishing to make a donation or volunteer for Reena Fun Day should call the Reena office at (416) 787-0131.

Toronto's young athletes attend JCC Maccabi Games in Cleveland

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sixty-nine young athletes from Toronto last week joined 2,500 of their fellow Jewish sportsmen to compete in the 1994 Jewish Community Centre North American Maccabi Youth Games in Cleveland.

The Toronto contingent fielded teams in track and field, swimming, basketball, tennis and in softball, where the boys will attempt to defend their gold medal.

Athletes from 68 cities in the United States as well as from Israel, Mexico, Britain and Australia will provide the competition for the Canadian sportsmen.

In addition to Toronto, JCCs from Edmonton, Vancouver, Hamilton, Ottawa, Windsor and Montreal are sending delegations to the games. While Toronto's is the largest, Montreal boasts a sizable delegation of 46 athletes, Ottawa, 28, Windsor, 14, Hamilton, 12. Edmonton and Vancouver will send two each.

The host city of Cleveland sports the largest group of athletes, 300, while Detroit, 144, Los Angeles, 129, Chicago, 128, and Greater Philadelphia, 79, also have sizable contingents.

At the other end of the spectrum are the one-athlete delegations from Albany and Las Vegas, though there is no truth to the rumor the Vegas entry is 10-to-one against winning a medal.

Since their 1982 inception in Memphis, the JCC North American Youth Maccabi Games have become a biennial tradition. The Games have been held in Detroit twice, and in Toronto and Chicago. Baltimore last hosted the Games in 1992.

The Games are a co-operative venture of North American JCCs. They also serve as a springboard for young athletes hoping to participate in the senior Maccabiah Games, held every four years in Israel. Former U.S. Olympic swimming gold medalist Mark Spitz and gold-medal gymnast Mitch Gaylord are both Maccabiah Games alumni.

This year, Toronto has boys and girls teams in basketball and boys and girls teams in softball, said Rhea Wolfowich, fitness assistant at the north branch of the Toronto JCC. The swim team is mixed while the tennis and track teams consist entirely of boys. Athletes between 13-16 are eligible to participate.

Jim Emery and Harold Cipin head up the Toronto delegation.

The CJN will have a full report on the results in upcoming editions.

Religious and spiritual needs of Jewish deaf examined

Visual images seen important

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — How to meet the religious and spiritual needs of the Jewish deaf community was the focus of a workshop given at the recent 20th Biennial Convention of the National Congress of the Jewish Deaf.

The workshop, lead by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, attracted an equal number of hearing and deaf participants.

Rabbi Goldstein, the director of Kolel, the Reform adult education centre in Toronto, once served as rabbi at Temple Beth Or, a New York City synagogue for deaf and hard of hearing people.

She said at first she thought translating the prayers into sign language would be sufficient for services, but it didn't work. She had underestimated the spiritual value of the sound of Hebrew words for a hearing person, she said. "The words carry a lot of spiritual feelings."

Instead Rabbi Goldstein used Jewish objects, like the shofar on Rosh Hashanah, to enhance a visual image for the congregation. "To hear the shofar — that moves my soul, but it's not going to move somebody who doesn't hear."

Rabbi Goldstein would also carry the Torah around, stopping at each row for people to touch and see it.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

"See, feel, touch is more meaningful [for the deaf]."

Rabbi Douglas Goldhamer of the Chicago-area Congregation Bene Shalom of the Deaf concurred with Rabbi Goldstein. "There are many ways to take Jewish symbols and adapt them," he said. He substitutes drums for the shofar because the sound vibrations can be felt more strongly. "The shofar is really heard [by deaf people] when it is felt," he said.

He added that some deaf rituals are not performed according to tradition.

Many young deaf Jewish women, he said, put on tefillin because it helps them feel and see their Judaism. As well, the Torah is held up in the air during readings for Rabbi Goldhamer's congregation to see, and the Torah portion is signed in Hebrew.

Tovah Wax, a deaf psychologist from Fairport, N.Y., stressed the importance of story telling to explain the Torah portions since story telling is a integral part of deaf culture.

Celebrations can also be adapted for the deaf. Two of Rabbi Goldhamer's congregants, Al Spanjer, a hearing child of deaf parents, and his wife Carolyn Stern-Spanjer, a deaf physician, said they designed a marriage ceremony which incorporated visual symbols like candles and holograms. All their immediate family members stood under the chupah.

Karen Bain, a hearing mother from Cleveland, attended the workshop to get ideas for a bat mitzvah she will be making for her 10-year-old deaf daughter. "I don't want her to have a bat mitzvah like everybody else, because she's not like everybody else," she said.

Workshop participants suggested Bain's daughter could tell the story of her Torah portion in sign, with the use of props as visual aids, or she could teach the congregation how to sign a short prayer.

Bain was pleased with the suggestions. "This workshop was the reason I came to the conference. It answered the questions I brought. The ideas were wonderful and creative."

Plaut outlines parallels between elderly and deaf

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There are many parallels between the elderly and the deaf, according to one rabbi who pointed out that both groups are treated differently by society at large.

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut was keynote speaker at the recent 20th biennial convention of the National Congress of the Jewish Deaf in Toronto.

"We [the elderly] are not treated like everybody else. You all know about that. You are not treated for who you are, but according to the disability you have," said Rabbi Plaut, 82.

He praised the congress members for taking pride in their identity. "You have your dignity. . .The fact that you are having a convention means you do not accept stereotyping by anyone else," he said.

Rabbi Plaut focused on the obstacles faced by the elderly, whom he said society sees as "useless. . .sexless. . .a drag on the public purse."

He said a lack of respect for the elderly in ancient Israel inspired laws to ensure they received better treatment. There are also several references in the Torah to honor and respect your parents, he said, "because a lot of people didn't then and don't today."

Rabbi Plaut said there are four things every elderly person should know: they have more time to learn; they have better values because they lose the urge to acquire things; they have more patience even though they have less time to live; and they learn to live one day at a time. "We can't assume we'll be here tomorrow, he said, "We don't know when the angel of death will knock on our door."

Struck by irony

Dave Wiesblatt, 21, a landscaper from Rockwood, Ont., said later he was particularly struck by the irony that old people have more patience despite the paucity of time left in their lives, while young people who have their whole lives ahead of them are always in a hurry. "It made me think that I don't need to rush," he said.

Warren Miller, 40, a computer programmer from Thornhill, said Rabbi Plaut's speech was relevant to his situation, because there are many parallels between the deaf and the aged. "We struggled for years to be recognized. We wear the same shoes (as the elderly), but we travel on different paths."

Ben-Gurion's son backs peace process

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's inevitable that a public lecture by Amos Ben-Gurion would invite comparisons with his legendary father, David, the fiery first prime minister of Israel who was a driving force behind the creation of the state.

Although he is well known in Israeli circles, Amos Ben-Gurion is not familiar to Toronto audiences.

Now in his mid-70s, he was born in London, England, and went to what was then Palestine as a small child. He is a former head of the Israel Police Force and was chief executive officer of Israel's largest textile company, Ata Ltd., from 1963 until 1980.

Ben-Gurion spoke to a capacity crowd of over 500 people at Temple Sinai last week on What Is The Unique Mission of Israel? His address was co-sponsored by Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University (BGU) of the Negev, Toronto chapter, and Temple Sinai's adult education committee.

Ben-Gurion is a member of the BGU board of governors. He made four stops in the Canadian BGU tour, including Montreal, Ottawa and Vancouver.

Several audience members commented privately that Ben-Gurion lacked the dynamism of his late father, but spontaneous applause followed the reasoned and articulate answers he gave to two particularly difficult questions.

Ben-Gurion had already stated his support for the Israeli government's involvement in the peace process before he was asked why the government is spending $78 million to assist the Palestinians in establishing self rule when they "should be" using the money to develop the desert.

"It is a fallacy that we will achieve cooperation on a practical level unless the Palestinians succeed in establishing their own institutions. If we take a negative attitude, I think it will be much more expensive not only in terms of money, but in blood too," answered Ben-Gurion, noting that he was expressing a personal opinion only.

"Why would Israel feel financially responsible for helping Palestinians when you have flourishing Arab countries that can help them?" asked a woman, her voice rising with emotion.

Amos Ben-Gurion

She was applauded by a number of listeners, one of whom called out, "Right on!"

Ben-Gurion, apparently unperturbed, explained, "We should do what is good for us. We cannot force other countries to support the Palestinians. I wish they would, but it doesn't mean that because they don't do it, we shouldn't do our share. It's in our interest to support them. It's [a question] of interest, not responsibility."

And what would David Ben-Gurion think of recent developments in Israel if he were still alive? It's a familiar question to his son, and one he raised himself.

Quoted letter from father

He quoted from a letter his father had written him in 1937, following a royal commission recommendation that Palestine be partitioned into separate Jewish and Arab states.

"There is only one consideration — what is needed and helpful to us," the statesman wrote. "My emotions are not hurt at all by having a Jewish state but a small one. What we do not want is a large Palestine which will not be Jewish. I prefer part of Palestine, but that part will be Jewish."

Ben-Gurion was an advocate of developing the Negev, as is his son. "The Negev constitutes 60 per cent of the land of Israel," Amos Ben-Gurion said.

He recalled travelling to the southern part of Israel in 1935 with his father, who envisioned a flourishing area including the port of Eilat — as it is now — rather than the "empty, dry and neglected" desert that he saw.

Ben-Gurion noted that the Negev is one of the few deserts that is shrinking, thanks to BGU research. That work is also helping Third World countries in the struggle against famine, he said.

The university's endeavors constitute "a wonderful dream and adventure...in rebuilding the frame of our nation," Ben-Gurion said.

Ben-Gurion was introduced by Paul Jacobs, president of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of BGU. He was thanked by Marsha Zinberg, chair of Temple Sinai's adult education committee.

Disabled Israeli basketball fan visits Toronto for hoops series

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When it comes to loving basketball, Erez Ziv has all the credentials. He comes from a basketball-playing family and he lives in a country where basketball is one of the top sports.

He's coached youngsters and he's even travelled to Barcelona to watch Dream Team I in the Olympic Games.

A hoops fan and player since he was 10, Ziv, 25, had his own aspiring career as a coach cut short by a traffic accident in Israel that left him wheelchair bound. But that hasn't stopped him, accompanied by his father Eli and mother Ita, from travelling the world to view top tournaments, visit relatives and see the sights.

An aficionado of the game, Ziv was in Toronto to watch the recently concluded World Championship of Basketball. And watch it he did, attending four games a day in the tournament's early going. He cut that down to a more modest two-games-a-day schedule, seeing 26 matches in all including the championship game in SkyDome.

"We knew the Americans would win, and they did," Ziv said. "There was no competition for the United States. They do it too easily. That's the problem."

Ziv, who hails from Kibbutz Gan Shmuel near Hadera, played competitive basketball in Israel until he was 18 when he was inducted into the army. He intended to pursue a career as a coach when he was discharged.

His life changed dramatically about three years ago on what should have been a routine drive home for the weekend.

Usually, his father Eli recalled, Erez got the use of a car, but on that particular weekend, it wasn't available so he "tremped" (hitch-hiked) home. Tragically the driver who picked him up, an army officer, was involved in a road accident in which he himself was killed, and which left Erez in a coma for three months.

Ziv had suffered a major head injury and when he came to, he was sent to a rehabilitation hospital in Ra'anana. He hated his experience there, making slow progress mostly because the facility was swamped with patients and the staff were unable to give the personalized care required, he said.

Eventually he was transferred to Beit Halochem, a rehabilitation and social centre for disabled army personnel and their families.

Ziv attends a Beit Halochem facility four times a week, receiving physiotherapy and participating in activities that include swimming, ceramics, shooting and even horseback riding.

"When I came there at first, I couldn't do anything," he said. "When I saw water, I sank. Now, I can swim very good. It's an example of my improvement. I almost couldn't do anything to move my body. Things that a normal man can do easily were very hard for me. Beit Halochem gave me the right treatment so I improved very much.

"At Beit Halochem I find friends all the time; we can work, we can smile, we can do everything. It changed my life completely."

Among his buddies, he's known for his passion for basketball. "For me; basketball is part of life. For others, no."

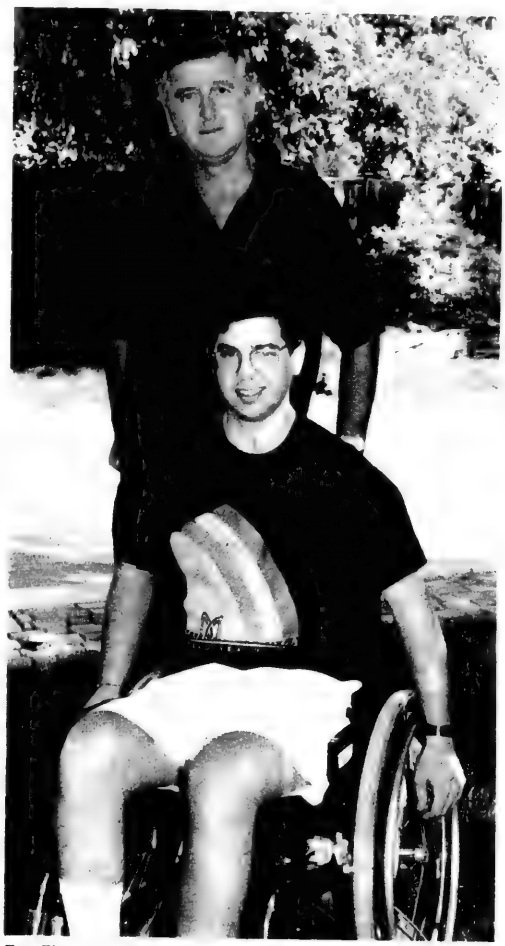
He comes by his love of the game honestly. In 1964, his father played for Kibbutz Givat Brenner in the first division of Israel's national basketball league and he was later three-time coach of the national junior team.

Basketball is the number two sport in Israel behind soccer. Israel hit the high water mark for the sport in 1986 when it finished sixth at the world championships, defeating Canada en route.

Ziv still draws an IDF paycheque, working on computers three days a week for the intelligence and information department. Last Independence Day, the army recognized his efforts in a special ceremony attended by Chief of Staff Ehud Barak.

But basketball is never very far from his thoughts. As he prepared to leave Toronto for the long trip home, he was already contemplating his next long distance adventure.

"I bet we're already planning to see Dream Team III in the Olympics in Atlanta," he said.



Erez Ziv and his father Eli were in Toronto recently to view the World Championship of Basketball. [Paul Lungen photo]

Congregation launches fund in Tamara Goldman's memory

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tamara Goldman was a star student at the Claude Watson School for The Arts, majoring in jazz dance and excelling in music.

She helped raise funds to send underprivileged children to summer camp, and assisted students at Alexander Muir Gladstone Public School choreograph a dance for a school production.

She had just begun to explore the Holocaust with her survivor grandparents.

This year she would have started at Earl Haig Secondary School. But in the middle of July, Tamara, 14, was killed when a rented Bombardier Sea Doo she and a friend were driving crashed into the shore of Six Mile Lake near Gravenhurst.

Through their synagogue, Congregation Habonim, Tamara's parents, Issie and Nanci Goldman, have established the Tamara Goldman Memorial Fund.

Monies raised through this fund will be directed to either Beth Habonim, to provide scholarships for needy youngsters wishing to participate in the March of the Living; the Tamara Goldman Camp Fund, which will send needy children from Alexander Muir Gladstone Public School to Camp Pinecrest; or to the Tamara Goldman-Claude Watson Memorial Fund, designed to assist needy students participating in the school's dance program.

Cheques should be made out to the Tamara Goldman Memorial Fund, and sent to to Beth Habonim, 5 Glen Park Ave., Toronto, M6B 4J2.

Eli Rubenstein, who delivered the eulogy at her funeral, called her a "remarkable young person," who "felt a bond with the past," and had "quiet grace, charm and dignity."

She was "a precious gift to all that knew her," Rubenstein said.

A group of close friends got together and prepared a eulogy for Tamara. They called Tamara "a beautiful person inside and out, who always made the best of a bad situation," and whose friends could confide in her.

They spoke of Tamara's sense of humour, and her "lovesome nature." Poignantly, the eulogy quoted Tamara's friend Kate as saying "we had decided to be best friends forever in Grade 7, and never expected that forever would end so soon."

Relatives said Tamara played the piano, saxophone and flute, and was a straight A student.

An inquest has been called into her death.

Gordon devoted life to Jewish education

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Wilferd Gordon, a prominent lawyer who devoted his life to Jewish education and community service, died August 1 at his Toronto home. He was 85.

He was the son of Rabbi Jacaob Gordon, who arrived in Toronto in 1904 as spiritual leader of the Goel Tzedec Congregation (University Avenue Synagogue), the Beth Hamidrash Hagodol Synagogue (McCaul Street Synagogue), and later several Russian synagogues.

Rabbi Gordon greatly influenced the creation of a community educational system and served as the first chairman of the Board of Education at the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto from 1917 to 1919.

Wilferd Gordon studied at a yeshivah in Chicago, received a bachelor's degree at McMaster University and a law degree at Osgoode Hall. He received smicha (rabbinic ordination) and took over his father's duties as a pulpit rabbi for two years after his death. He also served as a chaplain with the RCAF and was responsible for all the bases in Western Canada.

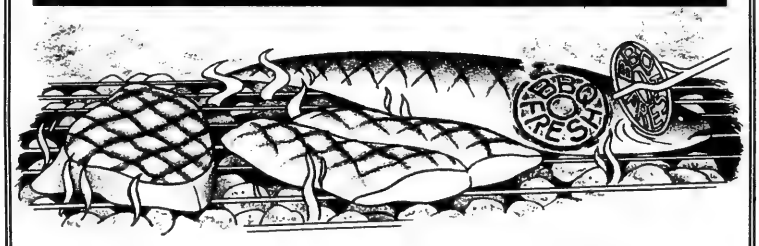
Like his father, Gordon was deeply committed to Jewish education. He was president of Associated Hebrew Schools from 1955 to 1961, founding president of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and was active on the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. He was a driving force in the founding and operation of the Ner Israel Yeshiva and maintained close ties with the Ner Israel Yeshiva in Baltimore.

Gordon was a practicing lawyer for more than 50 years and the founder of the law firm Gordon, Keyfetz and Hall. In 1976 Wilferd, his son Daniel (Danny), Walter Traub and Barry Rotenberg created the law firm now known as Gordon Traub.

Gordon is survived by his wife, Balfoura Gordon, a tireless community worker who suffered a stroke during the shivah period and is now in critical condition.

He is also survived by sister Fane Cohen of Kingston, Ont.; son Jared, a teacher living in Jerusalem with his wife Adina and their six children; son Danny and daughter-in-law Cooky, their four children and two grandchildren. His daughter, Phyllis Solomon, died of cancer in 1979.

THE LARGEST SELECTION OF BARBECUED FRESH FISH IN TORONTO



Each day there are 10 to 20 selections of BARBECUED fresh fish available at The Fish House. Prices and selections are updated each meal period to reflect the season and daily arrivals from all over the world.

To barbecue fresh fish, the correct degree of doneness requires expertise and knowledge that is only acquired through years of experience and training. Barbecuing sears in the natural flavours and juices of the fish, in turn preserving its individual tastes and flavours. The Fish House takes pride in having some of the most qualified fish cooks in the city!

New day care centre offers program in Hebrew

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Most parents would scramble to make alternative arrangements if their child's day care centre were closed down. Few, however, would come up with as unusual an arrangement as a group of Toronto parents did last year.

Rachel's Day Care, a non-profit Israeli-style "gan" for 1½- to 5-year-olds, was forced to close last September after it was discovered that the Centre Street enterprise wasn't licensed. The location had to be abandoned because of zoning difficulties.

Rachel Loiter, 45, a special education teacher in her native Israel, had "put her heart into" her new endeavor, unwittingly bypassing the necessary licensing procedures, she said.

The centre, now licensed, re-opened in a new location in Vaughan on March 29. Remarkably, none of the 26 children went elsewhere for day care in the intervening six months.

Instead, parents offered their homes on a rotating basis, and a team of five teachers worked independently, each running an in-home program for a small group of children.

"I saw the care Sari got in a month, and I became one of the [defenders] of the cause," said Dara Nathanson, a board member whose 4-year-old daughter attends the centre.

Rachel's Day Care, known in Hebrew as Gan Rachel, is the only one of its kind in Canada. It is the only licensed Israeli day care offering a program entirely in Hebrew.

Even the kosher breakfasts have an Israeli taam, with cucumbers and tomatoes forming part of the daily menu. On Fridays the centre is filled with the aroma of challot which the children prepare and take home.

Every morning each child is greeted by Loiter with a hug and kiss. Her staff includes Rivka Marants, a Russian-born teacher who spent two years in Israel, and supervisor Cheryl Solomon, an early childhood education teacher and ex-Montrealer, who will be teaching the children English starting in September.

The caring atmosphere was extended to an Israeli girl who came to Canada for brain surgery earlier this year. The children made cards for her, and she later visited the centre, where they served cake in her honor.

Loiter began offering day care in her home a few years ago to meet the needs of Israeli shlichim who were in Canada on a temporary basis. She had previously worked at Holy Blossom Religious School and at Bialik Hebrew Day School, following her immigration here seven years ago.

A typical day at the centre (which ends at 1:00 for some children, and 6:00 for others) includes up to an hour of circle time, when the children sit enraptured on small plastic chairs as an animated Loiter leads them through a series of songs, games and discussions. She ensures that each child participates equally.

The year-end party, attended by parents, was the year's highlight, planned around a Children of the World theme. Decorations, food and dancing were all reflective of the eight countries about which the children had learned. Even the youngest children knew the flags of countries such as Brazil, China and, of course, Israel.

Children at Rachel's Day Care posed in cardboard mortarboards for their end-of-year party. Each mortarboard was made by their teacher, Rachel Loiter.

"There's a different feeling here," says Solomon, who has also worked at day cares in Montreal. "There's no pushing the kids. It's very laid-back, in a positive way."

"It's a family kind of place," said Nathanson. "There are lots of celebrations."

"This day care is my life," said Loiter.

ROSH HASHANAH FOODS

Rosh Hashanah is the easiest holiday to prepare food for

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I can't believe it's Rosh Hashanah already. It seems like just yesterday I was putting away my Passover dishes. Of course, the holidays are really early this year, as opposed to being late which is what happens when they're not early. I still haven't figured out what would constitute them being on time.

Rosh Hashanah, in my opinion, has got to be the easiest of the holidays to cook for. All the summer produce is still available and the fall squashes, vegetables and apples have just started to arrive in the markets. I try to use as much of the fresh fruits as I can to create something special.

Every New Year I try to introduce a variety of new dishes into my family's eating repertoire. With two days of meals to prepare this is a great opportunity to be ingenious.

However, be warned, 10-year-olds do not appreciate creativity in any form (neither do their younger brothers). If I hear "a mushroom is not a vegetable, it's a FUNGUS" one more time I'll scream. I'm ignoring their pleas for a dinner where peanut butter, macaroni and Coca-Cola are the prominent ingredients.

Here is a recipe cornucopia of different tastes to help you really celebrate. May your New Year be as sweet as honey with just the right amount of spice to keep it interesting.

TURKEY ALMONDINE

1 medium boned turkey breast, cut into filets
5 tbsp. flour
2 eggs beaten
4 to 6 oz. sliced almonds
4 to 6 tbsp. margarine
2 oranges, cut into wedges

Coat turkey with flour. Dip one side of the turkey fillet into egg and then press the almonds into the egg-dipped side of the fillet. Melt margarine in skillet. Add turkey, almond side down. Cook at medium temperature for 6 to 7 minutes and turn. Cook 8 to 10 minutes more. Squeeze orange wedges over turkey and serve. This can be made ahead by preparing the turkey and not squeezing the juice on. To serve, heat in 350 oven until warm, removing from oven and squeezing juice over chicken. Serves 5 to 6.

TWO-GRAIN PILAF WITH WILD MUSHROOMS

½ cup uncooked barley
½ uncooked wild rice, rinsed and drained
¾ cup water
1 can (14½ oz.) chicken broth
1 tsp. dried thyme leaves
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. dried marjoram leaves
¼ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. margarine
1 medium carrot thinly sliced
1 cup sliced shiitake mushrooms (or regular mushrooms if others are unavailable)
½ cup celery, sliced
1 medium onion sliced

In a three-quart saucepan combine barley, rice, water, chicken broth, thyme, salt, marjoram and pepper. Cook over high heat until mixture comes to full boil. Reduce heat to low and cover. Continue cooking until water is gone and rice is tender (40 to 45 minutes). Meanwhile in a 10-inch skillet melt margarine until sizzling and add carrots. Cook over medium heat stirring occasionally, for about 2 minutes. Add mushrooms, celery and onions. Continue cooking, stirring occasionally, until celery is crispy and tender (2 to 3 minutes). Stir carrot mixture into rice mixture and serve. Serves 8.

SWEET GARLIC WITH CHICKEN PASTA

8 to 9 oz. garlic, minced
5½ tsp. olive oil
1½ lb. mushrooms (any variety), sliced
2 cups fresh plum tomatoes, diced
1 cup chopped green onions
1 tsp. crushed red pepper
2 cups chicken broth
1½ lb. chicken breasts, grilled, skinned, boned and diced
1 pkg. cooked bow tie noodles, rinsed and drained
4 oz. chopped parsley or cilantro

Heat olive oil in skillet, add garlic, and cook until LIGHTLY golden, not browned. Add mushrooms, tomatoes, green onions and crushed red peppers. Cook and stir 2 minutes. Add broth, simmer mixture, reducing slightly. Add chicken, noodles and half the parsley. Heat throughout. Garnish with remaining parsley.

TROPICADO HONEY SALAD

½ cup honey
¼ cup kosher red wine
2 tbsp. lime juice
dash salt
4 grapefruits, peeled and sectioned
1½ c. diced avocado
mint sprigs

Mix together honey, wine, lime juice and salt. Pour mixture over the grapefruit sections. Cover and chill several hours. Just before serving add the avocado to the grapefruit and mix lightly. Spoon into individual dishes and garnish with mint. Serves 6.

EZ APPLE PIEZ

1 ready made pie shell, uncooked

Filling

7 large tart apples, peeled, cored and quartered, then sliced thinly ½ cup brown sugar
3 tbsp. flour
½ tsp. ground nutmeg
¼ cup finely chopped pecans

Topping

1 cup flour
½ cup light brown sugar
½ cup sugar
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 stick margarine, cut into small pieces

Preheat oven to 450. Place oven rack at lowest position. Topping: Mix flour, sugars and cinnamon together in a bowl. Cut in margarine until mixture forms moist, coarse crumbs that clump together easily. Filling: Place apples in a large bowl. Toss with lemon juice to coat. In another bowl, mix together sugar, flour, cinnamon and nutmeg and nuts. Sprinkle over the apples and toss until evenly coated. Layer apple slices in pie shell, mounding them higher in the centre. Pat topping evenly over the apples to form a crust. Place pie on cookie sheet to catch the drips. Bake 15 minutes at 450 then reduce heat to 350. Bake 45 minutes until topping is golden brown (apples will continue to cook after the pie is removed.) If the topping browns too quickly drape a piece of foil over pie. Cool completely before serving. This is great with parve ice cream or parve whipped topping. Serves 8.

Israeli cheeses from goat's milk enjoy widespread popularity

Israelis prize their goat cheese and milk

Jerusalem Dateline

When Mark Twain visited Jerusalem, Jaffa and the Judean Mountains at the turn of the century he was surprised to learn that "nearly everyone, regardless of whether they live in the cities or the mountains, owns at least one goat."

Twain need not have been surprised, for the milk and cheese of goats have been valued in the region since the days of antiquity. All around the Mediterranean, from the Holy Land to Greece, the southern Balkans, parts of Italy, Spain and France, mountainous and stony land makes ideal conditions for raising goats.

So old is the art of making goat cheese that Pharoah Tutankhamen, who ruled Egypt 3,350 years ago, commanded his servants to place 22 tubs of his favorite goat in his burial chamber, some for him to eat while he waited to ascend to heaven and some as gifts for the gods who would welcome him to paradise.

As is seen in Homer's Odyssey, such cheeses also had their place in ancient Greece. Polyphemus, the one-eyed Cyclops, enjoyed nothing more than milking his ewes, thickening the milk and then making "rich and tangy cheese which he stored in straw baskets." Usually an even-tempered character, there was no reason to consider Polyphemus a monster. Only when he discovered that Odysseus and his crew members had eaten most of his precious cheese did Polyphemus decide to make Greek sailors a regular part of his diet.

In more modern times such cheeses have been particularly popular among Israeli Bedouins, nearly all of whom keep goats. As Israel became more and more modernized, however, such cheeses lost favor with the increasingly sophisticated urban population. Cheeses made from cow's milk became so widely accepted that nearly 40 years ago the large dairies of Israel made the decision not to produce goat cheeses.

Several years ago, however, to the great joy of gastronomes, a mini-revolution occurred and several small dairies, mostly located on kibbutzim and moshavim, decided to specialize in cheeses made from the milk of goats and sheep. Within a few short years, those cheeses have become the culinary rage of the nation and several of these dairies are now producing goat cheeses that rival the very best of France, Italy and the Balkan nations.

Depending on the season, the region and the process, goat and sheep's milk cheeses are now being made in such numbers that no list could hope to be complete. Among the most popular are cheeses similar to Greek feta and kasseri, Turkish kashkeval and brinza and French chevre. There are even gruyere and brie style cheeses made from creamy goat's milk.

In keeping with tradition, goat-milk cheeses are small in size, have a relatively high fat content and range from soft to medium-soft. Because goat's milk is vastly different from cow's milk, most people should not be put off by the high fat content (up to 45 per cent) of these cheeses, for goat-milk cheeses are easily digestible and contain high levels of the type of cholesterol that nutritionists tell us is good for us. They are also rich in protein, mineral salts and Vitamins A, B_1, B_2 and C.

If your guests ask, as many will, whether they should cut away and discard the rind of these cheeses, let them know that even though this is their privilege, it is unnecessary, for the rind is no less full of flavor than the cheeses themselves.

In addition to serving goat cheeses on their own (accompanied ideally by crackers, butter and, if desired, red wine), many of these cheeses are ideal for cooking. Unless otherwise indicated each of the following recipes is designed to serve 4 to 6.

FRIED GOAT CHEESE

¼ cup olive oil
4-5 cloves garlic, sliced
225 gr hard, salty kosher goats' cheese
Lemon wedges for garnish

Heat the oil in a heavy skillet and saute garlic until it is lightly browned. Remove the garlic with a slotted spoon and discard.

Cut the cheese into squares about 5 cms on each side and about 1 cm thick. Place the slices in the hot oil and cook, turning once, until the exterior of the cheese is almost but not fully melted. Remove with a slotted spoon and serve hot with the lemon wedges.

SPINACH SALAD WITH FETA CHEESE

1 clove garlic, halved
1 lb. spinach, washed and picked over well
2 hard boiled eggs, sliced
1 medium onion, thinly sliced
1 tomato, cut in wedges
½ cup kosher feta cheese, crumbled
6 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. kosher red wine vinegar
½ tsp. each oregano, salt and pepper
¼ tsp. mustard powder

Run the garlic clove over the inside of the salad bowl well. Tear the spinach leaves by hand and drop into the bowl. Add the eggs, tomatoes, onion and cheese. Toss gently.

Combine the remaining ingredients in a jar, cover and mix well by shaking. Pour the dressing over the salad, toss well but gently and serve as an appetizer or salad.

Proper diet stressed for healthy living

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

And God said "Behold, I have given you every herb yielding seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed — to you it shall be for food. (Gen. 1:29)

Gerald Hoffman, a certified Wellness and Lifestyle Educator specializing in nutrition knows that weight reduction can be very frustrating.

"People are told to do something about their problem, but they have no idea how to go about doing so, and they often receive no support or motivational help. This does not have to be the case, however, and with the right motivational techniques and nutritional education people can be on their way to leaner, healthier bodies," says Hoffman, founder of Weigh to Go, a wellness and lifestyle management program.

Hoffman says that diseases prevalent in North America such as cancer, diabetes, heart disease and arthritis, are diet related.

"We consider them as normal in the aging process, but medical evidence shows that other populations with a different diet have less evidence of these diseases, and studies show that the main culprit in the North American diet is fat. Whereas westerners have an approximately 45 per cent fat diet, other populations only have a 10 per cent fat diet and the main contributor of fat is animal products."

Hoffman changed his way of life five years ago after listening to a tape by Dr. Michael Klaper, who said, "If it had a face on it or came from anything that had a face on it, don't eat it."

"I decided to take responsibility for my own health," says Hoffman, "stopped eating all animal products, and wonderful things began to happen. After two weeks, I could pass the famous toe test — I could look down and see them — and my cholesterol and weight continued to decline. This happened without dieting or taking any supplements or special foods of any kind."

After a total weight loss of about 65 pounds and a significant drop in his cholesterol level, Hoffman says that he eats probably 50 per cent more than he did before, but in a different product mix. His diet now centres around the complex carbohydrates, vegetables, fruits, nuts and seeds.

"The bottom line is taking responsibility for your own health and the first thing we have to understand is the problem with nutrition — good food is not necessarily good for us."

Citing statistics from Dr. William Castelli at Harvard University, Hoffman says that Castelli has not seen any heart attacks in anyone who had a total cholesterol level of 3.9, regardless of other risk factors, such as smoking, obesity, age, hypertension, family history, or diabetes.

"A healthy diet consists of 80 per cent carbohydrates, 10 per cent fat and 10 per cent protein and to get to those figures, animal products can only be included on special occasions.

"Just prior to Rosh Hashanah is a good time to do something about a diet. Do not wait until after the holidays, but rather, serve good volumes of live, fresh foods at the yom tov dinner table. A large vegetable salad can be smothered with good tasting, low fat, low salt dressing and main dishes do not have to contain meat or eggs."

Hoffman suggests these vegetarian dishes, suitable for a yom tov dinner, supplied by the Jewish Vegetarian Association.

Vegetarian diet

VEGETARIAN KISHKE

2 stalks celery, chopped
¼ cup wheat germ
1 carrot, grated
2 tsps. paprika
1 large onion, chopped well
Dash of pepper
½ cup oil
2 tbsp. kosher tamari
1¼ cup whole wheat flour

Blend all ingredients together. Spoon half on aluminium foil and roll into a cylinder. Do the same with remaining half of the mixture. Place on baking pan and put in oven for 45 minutes at 350 degrees. Turn gently. Cook 45 more minutes.

PASTA AND BEAN STEW

1 large carrot
1 large onion
1 large leek
1 large potato
3 oz. haricot beans, well cooked
3 oz. pasta shells
2 tsp. tomato puree
2 tsp. mixed herbs
1 tbsp. oil
1 cup water

Peel and slice onion and carrot, peel and cube potato and chop leek into ½ inch sections. Heat oil in pan and saute vegetables gently for a few minutes. Add water, herbs and tomato puree. Bring to boil, cover and simmer for up to 10 minutes. Add pasta, beans, and cook for another 20 minutes or until vegetables are just tender. Season to taste.

THE PURSUIT OF NAZI WAR CRIMINALS – A SYMPOSIUM

Is It Too Late To Pursue War Criminals?

by Milton Harris

Why prosecute old men for war crimes committed in a war that ended before most living Canadians were born? That is the question that persistently dogs all advocates of war crimes trials.

Because Canada's War Crimes legislation covers not only the Second World War but also present day war crimes or crimes against humanity, this same question will also have to be dealt with by future generations of Canadians.

The "leave the poor old fellows alone to die in peace" proponents attack from several angles:

Why Pursue Old Men Who Probably Have Not Harmed Anyone for Half a Century?

Under the 1987 amendments to Canada's Criminal Code, alleged war criminals can be prosecuted only for "underlying offences" such as murder, manslaughter, or kidnapping, enhanced by the further quality of being war crimes or crimes against humanity.

Contrary to long-settled principles of English law, does anyone believe in a statute of limitations for serious crimes like murder? Should a murderer who has eluded capture for 50 years not be made to face responsibility for his crime?

What if, instead of killing himself, the murderer of 14 women at the University of Montreal in 1992 had escaped? Suppose he had eluded capture for 50 years. Should we then let him go scot free as a reward for successfully evading capture until he was 75 years old?

When Helmut Rauca was 74 years old, in 1982, he faced an extradition hearing in a Canadian court, accused of causing the murder of more than 3,000 women, as well as almost 5,000 children. Why should the passage of time exculpate this crime? Upon confirmation that the evidence of his guilt was persuasive, and a denial of his appeal, Rauca was extradited to West Germany where he died in prison awaiting trial for these monstrous crimes.

After so Many Years, Should We Not Forgive Crimes That, After All, Were Committed in the Passion of War?

Unfortunately, the public often thinks of a "war criminal" as someone who is incited by the fervour of war to shoot captured soldiers or machine gun seamen escaping from a torpedoed ship. But the Nazis' merciless program to murder all the Jews had nothing to do with winning the war against the Allied armies. Indeed, the Germans' relentless pursuit of the "final solution of the Jewish problem" often interfered with the successful conduct of the war. As the Germans' long retreat on the Russian front progressed, the supply of railroad cars to provision the retreating troops became crucial. Nothing, however, restrained Adolph Eichmann's power to commandeer scarce railroad cars away from the German war effort so he could transport Jews to their death.

Today, extremist Hutus are hacking defenceless men, women and children to death in Rwanda in a civil war of purposeful extermination. If, after the war ends, some of these perpetrators were to be found in Canada, should we excuse these repulsive murders because they were committed in the heat of war? Can any country that considers itself part of the Community of Nations accept such a defence?

Why do We Insist on Wreaking Vengeance on Those Who Were Only Doing Their Duty by Following National Law or Superior Orders When Their Country Was at War?

The defence of "only following orders", or obeying the law in place at the time can hardly excuse crimes that are obviously beyond the limits of lawful behaviour in any civilized society. What kind of world order will ever be created if we allow criminal governments to murder, at will, groups of their own citizens or those of conquered territories?

In early 1993 a Bosnian Serb confessed that he had raped and murdered several Moslem women in obedience to an order from the Serb leadership to "ethnically cleanse" disputed territory by terrorizing the Moslems. If tried in a Canadian court, no jury would accept his defence that he did not know he was committing a crime because he was only obeying de facto law or following orders.

Should we exonerate a machine gunner who was one of those murderers of 35,000 men, women and small children at Babi Yar because he was following orders from his Einsatz Group commander? Can anyone claim that he did not know he was committing a crime when he murdered a two-year old girl with a pistol shot to the back of the head? In law, this is called "manifest illegality", and every reasonable person knows, or ought to know, this is a heinous crime.

What Canadian Court Could Ever Believe Eye-Witnesses Who Are Digging Into Their Memories to Recall Details of Events That Happened a Half Century Ago?

Without careful thought it would seem incredible that someone could remember, and bear witness to small details of events that happened a half century before. Yet, in the denaturalization hearing in Vancouver against Jacob Luitjens in 1992, Mr. Justice Collier of the Federal Court believed testimony from eight eye-witnesses who recounted memories from events in Holland 50 years before. He concluded that events sufficiently traumatic are retained for life. This is an easy proposition to test on ourselves: anyone of us who was 10 years old or more at the time, can remember every detail of the news report, and what we were doing, when we first heard about the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, or President Roosevelt's death in 1945, or the assassination of John F. Kennedy in 1963. Judges and juries will believe witnesses recounting the smallest details from 50 year old memories of seeing a friend deported, an elderly woman shot, or a son murdered.

Despite the passage of so many years – despite the failure, so far, to convict anyone charged under the new section – War Crimes or Crimes Against Humanity that are so "manifestly illegal" that they will offend the conscience of a Canadian jury will still result in convictions of the perpetrators. That will be the ultimate answer to the question: "why pursue these criminals for their crimes committed a half century ago?"

EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

The pursuit of Nazi war criminals who found refuge in Canada has proven to be a frustrating experience for the Jewish community. In the first place, there has been only sporadic coverage by the media of whatever efforts the Canadian Government has actually expended to find and prosecute these criminals. Secondly, the fact that it has taken almost half of a century for the government to come to grips with the problem has led to the suspicion that the efforts have themselves only been half-hearted, despite persistent prodding by the Canadian Jewish Congress and others. Lastly, the legal issues which arose in this area have led to redefining the issues in which Canada has had very little experience.

The result of all this is that many Canadian Jews are confused about what actually has transpired and what still needs to be done if the issue is finally to be laid to rest. We present in this issue a symposium: The Pursuit of Nazi War Criminals. Milton Harris, one of the leaders of CJC's efforts to prod our Government to keep the issue on the front burner, despite the difficulties involved, directly confronts this question and its various ramifications. He argues strongly for the need to continue the pursuit as energetically as possible.

Jack Silverstone National Executive Director of CJC, has been immersed in the problem on almost a daily basis. He outlines this involvement and gives us a summary of its history. He also points out how these efforts which have succeeded in only one actual case thus far – that of Jacob Luitjens who was deported – have nonetheless had an important effect in that the Supreme Court of Canada has made short shrift of all the constitutional arguments that have been thrown up against our efforts to prosecute these criminals.

Arnold Fradkin has been involved specifically in the technical legal aspects of the question, and has reviewed the developments in this area over almost the last half century. He also offers a comparison between the American and Canadian approaches to the issue. He concludes that revocation of citizenship and deportation proceedings have thus far proven to be a successful way to proceed.

Jim Torczyner and Shari Brotman have made an exhaustive analysis of the 1991 census which has recently been made public. We are fortunate that in Canada the census includes statistics on Canadian Jews, an area not included in the American census. These figures and the light they throw on the future of the Canadian Jewish community are an indispensable element in the planning of our community leadership. As we know, Jewish "continuity" has become the most recent buzzword in these discussions and the authors explain in some detail how this is a reflection of the view that a serious decline in the number of Jews in Canada is imminent, a view with which they disagree. Their reasons for this stance raises questions on the relative importance of ethnicity and religion in the Jewish psyche, an issue that has seldom been raised but is both interesting and important.

The tremendous implications for world Jewry of the now irreversible drive toward peace between Israel and the Arab world are just beginning to be digested by Jewish leaders. One thing is certain: the relationship between Israeli and Diaspora Jews will henceforth be dramatically different.

Varying predictions on this question are already being advanced. Some are saying that the major Jewish concern of this century heretofore has been whether Israel will survive the concerted onslaught from the Arab world; now that Israel's survival is ensured, the major Jewish concern will be whether the Diaspora will survive. A second question is the one Professor Bauer analyses in his article Diaspora and Israeli Jews: One People or Two?; now that Israel can look forward to even more financial support from the USA, a drastic reduction in military expenditures and increased trade with all the Middle East countries, it will need to rely less and less on financial support from Diaspora Jews. It will tend therefore to set its own priorities as a State which may differ drastically from the Zionist impulse and the religious principles in which Zionism is embedded.

Assuming therefore that both Israeli and Diaspora Jews will survive, does this portend that the Jews will gradually become two people rather than one?

Monica Shapiro has sent us a sensitive account of her reaction to a retreat for CJA leadership in which she participated in August 1993. She indicates how important it is for our leaders (and all of us) to take time out from dealing with our crowded community agenda to reflect on our history and our religion. Such an exercise can do much to "illuminate our journey as Jews".

Two poems by Ken Sherman conclude our issue.

War Crimes Prosecutions: Post-Finta

by Jack Silverstone

Prior to the establishment of the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals, commonly known as the Deschênes Commission, in 1985 and the production of its report in 1987, it could be fairly said of this country that if Martin Bormann or some other notorious Nazi war criminal were to have been found walking down any main street in Canada, the response of the Federal Justice Department would have been that unless some other non-Soviet country wanted him – and even then, only pursuant to rigorous extradition conditions – there was nothing that could be done to deal with the presence of this person on Canadian soil.

Now, some seven years since the tabling of the Deschênes Commission report and the subsequent implementation of amendments to the Canadian Criminal Code and other relevant legislation that deal with the presence in Canada of suspected war criminals, the question: Has the situation improved? must be answered with an unequivocal yes. Should we then be satisfied with the results? An equally unequivocal no must be the response.

Five cases have been brought forward since 1987. Four of those five have been criminal prosecutions. Two failed even to get to trial despite very serious allegations. Those were the cases of Michael Pawlowski in Ottawa and Stephen Reistetter in St. Catharines, Ontario. One, that of Imre Finta of Toronto, resulted in an acquittal after a lengthy jury trial. That verdict was upheld at the Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. Another criminal proceeding, that against Radislav Grujicic, is ongoing in Windsor, Ontario, at the time of writing.

Only One Successful War Crimes Case

The one successful post-Deschênes case thus far involved the denaturalization of Jacob Luitjens, a former botany professor at the University of British Columbia. Mr. Luitjens, who was convicted in absentia by the Dutch of collaborating with the Nazis in occupied Holland during the Second World War, was stripped of his Canadian citizenship for the concealment of his war record and deported to Holland, where he was immediately imprisoned. He is set to be released in the spring of next year.

In the Finta matter, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a recent 4-3 decision, rejected the Crown's appeal for a new trial. The judgment has aroused the ire of many students of the war-crimes issue for its apparent move away from the broadly accepted Nuremberg principles of international law. The decision raises the standard of mens rea – Latin for "the guilty mind" – an essential element in most Criminal Code offences, to a very high level. It is mooted that this will act as a severe impediment to any possible success in future war-crimes cases, Nazi or otherwise. An obscure provision in the Supreme Court rules of practice has been invoked to try to get the Court to re-hear the matter or at least to produce supplementary reasons that would clarify the position and thereby, hopefully, facilitate, rather than impede, future criminal proceedings. Not unsurprisingly, the Supreme Court of Canada rejected the petition without issuing reasons, as is their custom.

Supreme Court Swept Away Old Bugaboos Against Prosecution

Where does this decision leave us in Canada

today? For one thing, the Supreme Court made short shrift of all the constitutional arguments that for so long had been thrown up in the faces of those who wanted to bring suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada to trial. Retroactivity, selective unfairness, unreasonable delay – all the old bugaboos that mitigated against prosecution – were swept away by the Supreme Court, as indeed they were in the Ontario Court of Appeal. This is undoubtedly a positive development.

Finta was accused of supervising the holding area and the loading of thousands of Jews from the Szeged ghetto in Hungary onto transport trains to the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp. Without minimizing the gravity of his crime, a Canadian jury could, and apparently did, infer that the manifest illegality of his activity was not sufficient to convict. Had the case involved his parading up and down the holding area with a pistol in hand, shooting people, this would have likely led to a conviction by a Canadian jury. In other words, patently egregious cases should be negatively affected by the Finta judgment.

A gnawing concern, however, is that the negative aspects of the judgment may be put forward by recalcitrant prosecutors – who are all too often too timid to proceed anyway – as a crutch for further inaction.

The criminal prosecution option was the result of the so-called "made-in-Canada" solution, adopted after much pressure from Canadian groups of various European origins who agitated vehemently and vigorously against deportation or extradition to then-Soviet bloc countries. Although holding much initial promise, in Canada the criminal prosecutions remedy for war crimes has not been a stirring success.

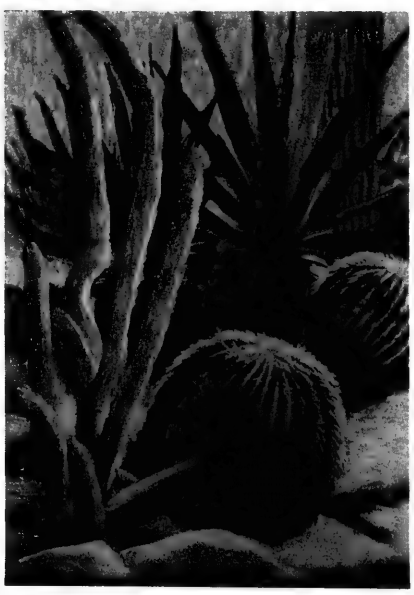
By their nature, these cases will never be easy. Witnesses are hard to come by, as older survivors and eyewitnesses are often reluctant to relive the past or to travel to this jurisdiction to give evidence. They all require meticulous, determined and aggressive lawyering and police work in order to bring them to a successful conclusion.

A good example of this was a pre-Deschênes proceeding, the 1983 extradition from Canada to then-West Germany of Albert Helmut Rauca, the notorious former commander of the Kaunas ghetto. Rauca died in a jail cell before he could be brought to trial. This case demonstrated what can be accomplished by dedicated, determined and experienced prosecutors. The same was even more true in the Luitjens denaturalization.

Revocation of Citizenship and Deportation Must Be Emphasized

The question that must obviously be posed is: Why, in the face of several unsuccessful criminal efforts, has not the denaturalization remedy, based upon the successful Luitjens precedent, been used with greater alacrity? No satisfactory answer has yet been provided. While perhaps it may have been politically preferable to ensure that individuals were tried in Canada during the Soviet era that is past, and surely the revocation of citizenship and deportation route must be given expanded consideration.

The new justice minister, the Hon. Allan Rock, has made pronouncements on the war-crimes issue, indicating it to be a priority of his government and ministry. He has stated that there are files on his desk that he is reviewing with a view to deciding whether or not to proceed with prosecutions or to turn them over to his ministerial colleague, the Hon. Sergio Marchi, minister of immigration, for denaturalization proceedings. The March 1994 deadline for prioritization of cases set by his predecessors has now come and gone, and the matter remains unresolved. Without entering into a numbers game, the best estimate is that there are some ten to twenty serious cases which are either on the minister's desk or on their way through the Justice Department's war-crimes unit to him now. How these pending cases play out over the next several months will obviously affect the credibility of the Justice Department.



"DESERT GARDEN #16" BY ANITA SHAPIRO, MONTREAL

Canada Still Viewed As a Haven for Nazi Criminals

As a footnote, there remains another outstanding matter: that of Vladimir Sokolov, who was alleged to have been a Nazi propagandist in occupied Russia during the Second World War. While not necessarily accused of war crimes, Sokolov did flee the United States in 1989 ahead of a denaturalization proceeding and chose, of all places, Montreal. This was particularly disturbing in that it was only two years after the report of the Deschênes Commission, which produced startling revelations about Canada as a haven for Nazi war criminals in the post-War period. Sokolov's status and whereabouts are unknown today. Canadian Jewish Congress has made a motion before the Federal Court to have the government reveal just that. The matter is currently being litigated. What resonates is that Canada is still being perceived as a haven by Nazi criminals and collaborators.

For discredited ex-U.S. rocket scientist Arthur Rudolph and his friends in Alabama, that perception proved to be an error. Accused of using slave labour in the German missile program during the war, Rudolph voluntarily gave up his American residency and returned to Germany. When he tried to return to the U.S. via Canada in 1992, he was barred and ordered deported from this country.

Not Enough Lessons Have Been Learned

One of the saddest truths that emanates from this whole process is that not enough lessons have been learned. In our contemporary society, war crimes and crimes against humanity continue at a disturbing pace. One need only look at Rwanda, the former Yugoslavia, and other trouble spots in the world. It is interesting to note that Mr. Justice Deschênes, who headed up the Canadian commission of inquiry, is now one of the judges on an international panel attempting to formulate a methodology for prosecuting suspected war crimes and crimes against humanity in the Bosnian conflict. Whether they will succeed remains to be determined, and what deterrent effect the existence of such a commission has on the contemporary scene will only be determined later.

However, this leads to another crucial question: If Canada will not actively and aggressively seek to bring suspected Nazi war criminals to justice, even after many of them were permitted entry into this country surreptitiously and quite improperly, then what gives us the moral standing and right to judge contemporary war criminals, be they in Europe, Africa or elsewhere? The issue of bringing suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada to the bar of justice must be front and centre on the agenda of everyone interested in human rights, for that is precisely what it is: a human-rights issue, an issue of law, justice and morality.

Dealing With Nazi War Criminals In North America:

A Comparative Review

by Arnold Fradkin

Some time after the Second World War, the governments of Canada and the United States became increasingly aware of the possibility that they had admitted Nazi war criminals and collaborators as immigrants, and had granted them citizenship. By 1971, reports began to appear in the Toronto Star and by 1986 revelations of the existence of Nazi persecutors hiding in Canada and evading justice appeared on television and in other newspapers across the nation with some regularity. According to Chief Justice Deschenes, estimates of their numbers ranged from a "handful" according to the Justice Department to 6,000 cited by Simon Wiesenthal. After 1983 estimates from non-government persons never fell below 1,000. In the United States, estimates were in the thousands. The American Government had initiated some legal proceedings but they were only a handful and basically ineffective, and media reports were increasingly critical. Eventually both countries made a commitment to resolve the problem. They went about it in different ways.

The Canadian Experience

By Order in Council approved February 7, 1985, the Government of Canada referred the matter to a Royal Commission of Inquiry chaired by Chief Justice Deschenes. It stated (in part), that the Government

> "wishes to adopt all appropriate measures necessary to ensure that any such war criminals currently resident in Canada, or hereafter found in Canada, are brought to justice."

And it found as a fact that after 1948:

> "whether by coincidence or by design, in the third of a century which followed, Canada devoted not the slightest energy to the search and prosecution of war criminals."

For Jews, especially for survivors of the Holocaust, and for Canadians generally, the possibility that such persons continue to live, unhindered, unrepentant and unpunished in our country is a continuing perversion of our sense of justice. It is an obscenity compounded by our awareness of reports that Canadian immigration policy after the Second World War had the effect of making it easier for Nazis to enter this country than for Jewish survivors. The need to effectively remove this shadow on Canada's integrity is a moral imperative of the highest order.

A special litigation unit within the Department of Justice was set up in the spring of 1987 under the auspices of Bill Hobson, Q.C., who was at that time Assistant Deputy Attorney General of Canada, and an investigation unit was organized within the RCMP.

Since the spring of 1987 proceedings have been instituted against five alleged Nazi was criminals living in Canada. Four of these proceedings were by way of criminal proceedings, and one by revocation of citizenship and deportation. Only the latter proceeding has, to date been successful, in the case of Jacob Luitjens. Continued on page 4

Jewish Continuity in Canada

by Jim L. Torczyner and Shari L. Brotman

Of all the dimensions of collective life, survival as a people remains the overarching and paramount Jewish communal concern. The five thousand year saga of Jewish history has unfolded in a distinct and often perilous fashion. From pogroms to the Holocaust and national rebirth in the State of Israel, from forced conversion to voluntary assimilation, from being Jewish by choice to having no choice but to be Jewish, the global Jewish experience has been one of survival and rebirth in the face of adversity.

The code word for Jewish survival is continuity. In North America where Jews have not experienced physical persecution, the threat to "continuity" has been one of assimilation, weakened identity, intermarriage and a negative birth rate. From time to time, one hears sounds of alarm concerning the imminent decline of the Jewish community and its impending, self-imposed oblivion. Over the past few years, the theme of "continuity" has re-emerged as the central agenda item of Jewish communal organizations in North America. In Canada both nationally and across the country, conferences, commissions, councils and committees have been established by Jewish communal organizations in an attempt to combat this "imminent threat" to Jewish life.

Continuity refers to two aspects of the Jewish experience. The first concerns the ability of the Jewish community to increase or at least maintain its numbers. This is achieved through births, immigration, and conversions to Judaism. It is counteracted by emigration, deaths, and assimilation through the marriage of Jews to non-Jews. The second aspect of continuity concerns the strength of Jewish identity. The cohesion of the Jewish community is achieved through involvement in communal life, religious practice, links to Israel and communal identification.

The impetus for this shift in community priorities has much to do with research findings published in the United States based on the Council of Jewish Federations 1990 National Jewish Population Survey. Among its findings,the study reported that 28% of all currently married born Jews are married to non-Jews. Even more alarming, the study determined a 52% intermarriage rate for all born Jews who married since 1985. Combined with findings about low birth rates and varied and weakened forms of identity, the study rang the alarm bells about the threat to Jewish survival, and "continuity" became the clarion call of the U.S. Jewish federations.

It has often been assumed that Canadian Jewry is almost indistinguishable demographically from its counterpart in the United States. Gary Tobin, a leading demographic scholar based at Brandeis university, claims that to the extent that Canadian Jews are different from American Jews it is a function of being a newer community with higher rates of immigration. Tobin argues that these differences will disappear within a generation, and that Canadian Jews will follow the American pattern of assimilation within a few years. Such assertions are echoed by some Canadian academics who claim that high rates of intermarriage coupled with declining birthrates and questions about changing patterns of Jewish identification and affiliation, have led them to a view that the decline of the Jewish people in Canada is imminent.(Davids, 1989; Brym, 1993). Canada, however, is not the United States, and Canadian Jews have distinctive characteristics which set them apart from their American counterparts. Our analyses of the 1991 Canadian census demonstrate that these fashionably grim assessments of the decline of Canadian Jewry are inaccurate. Rather, the Jewish community in Canada is larger, stronger and has more children than it did in 1981, and rates of intermarriage remain substantially lower than those in the United States. We base this assessment on overall growth rates, patterns of identification and rates of intermarriage as dimensions of continuity which we explore in the 1991 Census and compare them to findings from the 1981 Census and from the CJF 1990 population study in the United States.

We do not suggest, however, that there is no cause for concern. Indeed, Canadian Jewish life is demographically similar to the United States in many ways. The data indicate that there are significant threats in Canadian life to the continuity of the Jewish community, and that these threats tend to pattern the American experience. These threats, however, are more modest, less sweeping, and more regional in nature than they are in the United States. In sum, the threats themselves are more Canadian. This article identifies the communities and populations at risk to better pinpoint the nature of the problem and its possible solutions.

The judgment delivered by the Court in the Luitjens case was of immense precedential value. The court expressly accepted witnesses' testimony concerning facts which occurred more than 40 years ago, accepted and utilized expert evidence to assist in its findings, characterized the Holocaust as "accepted historical fact" and accepted circumstantial evidence of immigration fraud which was extremely important.

The United States Experience

The past history of Nazi war criminals in the United States is, in some ways, similar to that of Canada. Suspected Nazi war criminals entered that country in considerable numbers and for thirty years little if anything was done. Alan Ryan Jr., former Director of the Office of Special Investigation (OSI) in his book Quiet Neighbours, Prosecuting Nazi War Criminals in America, put it this way:

> For nearly thirty years, we ignored the evidence that Nazi war criminals were in America, and we allowed the Government's enforcers to look the other way as well. We simply were not interested in the possibility that those who had killed innocent people might have found sanctuary among us.
> This indifference persisted well into the 1970's when at last a few determined men and women in Congress insisted that the Justice Department investigate these criminals and take legal action against them.

Finally in 1979 the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) set up the office of Special Investigation headed by Assistant Attorney General Philip Heymann, a Harvard Law School professor on leave to the Government. Alan Ryan, Director of the OSI has stated:

> "The prosecution of Nazi criminals in America was not exclusively a Jewish issue. What was needed was tough, fair, vigorous prosecution. Still, the complaint of the American Jewish representatives was that the INS had not been committed to the prosecution of Nazis, and that it was insensitive to the jarring injustice that the murderers of eleven million people – six million of them Jews – should find haven in the United States."

In its fourteen years of existence, the OSI has achieved an admirable record of success. Forty-seven Nazi persecutors in the United States have had their citizenship revoked, thirty-five have been deported, extradited, or have left the country voluntarily, and seventeen cases are presently pending in the courts.

The Canadian and United States Experience Compared

In many ways Canada's legislation permitting criminal prosecution of alleged war criminals is the most advanced and noble of the means adopted by countries to deal with this issue. Unlike the situation in the United States, persons in Canada accused of war crimes will stand trial in Canada for those crimes, wherever committed, in accordance with our judicial values and practices. And if convicted, they would face imprisonment in our jails rather than have their citizenship revoked and/or be deported. Unlike the recent legislation in Australia and the United Kingdom, the Canadian legislation applies not only to Nazis but to all war criminals, past, present and future, and to all war crimes. In effect, Canada has put itself in the position of an international war crimes court since it has jurisdiction to try any war criminals found here for crimes committed anywhere in the world.

On the other hand, the skillful use of revocation of citizenship, deportation and extradition employed by the United States to deal with and/or rid the country of Nazi war criminals has been highly effective.

The programs dealing with Nazi war criminals adopted by Canada and the United States will, no doubt, be minutely scrutinized and judged by lawyers, historians, politicians, academics and others in the years to come. What is clear at the moment is that both countries have expressed their will to deal with Nazi war criminals and that in both countries revocation of citizenship and deportation proceedings have, so far, proven to be a successful way of doing so.

Understanding the Definition of Jewish in the Canadian Census:

The Canadian Census represents the largest data base of any Jewish population outside of the state of Israel. Its 20% sample reflects responses of 71,200 Jews along an extensive range of socio-economic demographic variables. Unlike the US Census, which does not ask questions on religious affiliation, the Canadian Census asks respondents questions on both Religious Affiliation and Ethnic Ancestry. These questions are: "To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did your ancestors belong?" "To which religion or denomination do you belong?"

Respondents to the census are permitted to choose only one religion. They may choose up to four ethnic affiliations. These ethnic responses, however, are not reported in order of priority, and, consequently, one cannot make any inferences regarding the strength of identity based on multiple ethnicity alone.

Both in 1981 and in 1991, the Council of Jewish Federations and the McGill Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning, developed a core definition of Jewishness according to the census as follows:

"A Jew is someone who identifies him/herself as being 'Jewish by religion', or 'Jewish by religion and Jewish by ethnic origin' (i.e. Jewish Religion and Polish by Ethnic Origin) or 'Jewish by ethnic origin with no religion".

Thus, the only group excluded from this core definition of Jewishness are those persons who identified themselves as Jewish ethnically but with a religion other than Jewish (i.e. Catholic by religion and Jewish by Ethnic Origin). Jews by religion, ethnic Jews, and secular Jews with no religious affiliation are all included in this definition.

Various theories have been put forward regarding what the different components of Jewishness measured by the Census (i.e. religion alone, religion and ethnicity, ethnicity and no religion) mean in terms of the strength of Jewish identity. Views on this matter are also related to important ideological preferences. We do not seek to advance ideological positions but hope to inform them with data and analysis. The issue of Jewish Identification will be discussed further on in this article.

Growth of the Jewish Community

The Jewish population in Canada reached 356,315 persons in 1991. This represents an actual growth rate of 14.2% and in increase of 44,215 Jews in the last decade. This substantial growth of the Jewish community is not uniform. Vancouver experienced the largest percentage increase in its Jewish population (31%) while Toronto outdistanced all other Jewish communities in terms of its actual gain in numbers. The Toronto Jewish community increased by more than 33,000 persons and this represents a growth rate of 26.4%. Clearly, Toronto has become the demographic centre of Canadian Jewry. Almost half of all Jews in Canada (45.6%) lived in Toronto in 1991. Very few Jewish communities experienced a net loss in population in the past ten years (Montreal, Winnipeg and Windsor), and the losses for Montreal and Winnipeg (2.1% and 6.2% respectively), were far less than what had been expected or previously reported.

Generally speaking, changes in the size of Jewish communities patterned overall changes in Canadian cities as a whole. Urban centres such as Toronto, Vancouver and Ottawa which experienced growth rates of between 28 and 31% in the past ten years also experienced comparable increases within their Jewish communities. Cities which had relatively small growth rates – Montreal, Windsor and Winnipeg – lost Jewish population in the last decade.

Changes in the overall size of Jewish communities are functions of complex and often competing processes. Immigrants, migrants from other parts of Canada, births, converts and persons who renew their identification as Jews account for most increases in population size. Out-migration, emigration, deaths, marrying out, or ceasing one's identification account for most population losses. Some of these factors are measured by the census. Immigration and increased numbers of children are two such factors and they account for most of the increased size in the Jewish community in Canada.

"BOTANICAL GARDENS/MONTREAL #1" BY ANITA SHAPIRO, MONTREAL

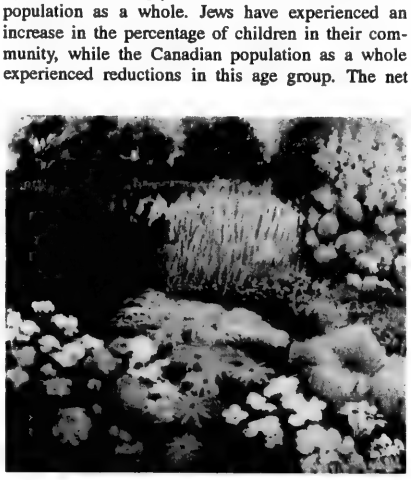
More than 30,000 Jews immigrated to Canada in the past ten years, and these persons account for 70% of the increase in the size of the Jewish community. Close to one out of ten Canadian Jews immigrated to Canada in the last ten years, and more than 15% of all Jews in Canada today arrived in the past 20 years. This is almost twice the percentage of immigrants in the past 20 years in the Canadian population as a whole (8.9%).

The impact of immigrants on Jewish communal life is profound. Immigrants are less likely to intermarry. They are more likely to live more traditional Jewish lifestyles, have larger families, and live in cities with well developed Jewish institutional networks. 80% of Jewish immigrants to Canada in the last ten years settled in Toronto or Montreal.

In relation to continuity, immigration has a positive effect, and on this dimension alone there are substantial differences between the Canadian and U.S. experiences. In Canada, 70% of all Jews were born in Canada. In the United States, 92% of the CJF National Population Study sample were born in the United States.

The nature of Jewish immigration, however, is changing. Almost half of all Jewish immigrants to Canada in the past ten years were born either in the former Soviet Union or in Israel (25%; 20%). One in four was born in South Africa or in the United States. The demographic characteristics which these groups develop may or may not be similar to those of previous immigrants.

A second factor which both contributes to the overall growth of the Jewish community as well as confounds popular conception is the increase of the number of children 0-14 years of age in the last ten years. This population increased from 72,115 persons to 74,345 persons. This 3% change helps to balance out the age structure of the Jewish community which increasingly resembles that of the Canadian population as a whole. Jews have experienced an increase in the percentage of children in their community, while the Canadian population as a whole experienced reductions in this age group. The net effect, however, was that in 1991, 21% of all persons in both the Jewish and Canadian populations as a whole were in the 0 – 14 age range.



"BOTANICAL GARDENS/MONTREAL #2" BY ANITA SHAPIRO, MONTREAL

As previously mentioned, our standard Jewish definition is composed of the interplay of the ethnicity and religion variables. Approximately 90% of the Jewish community identifies Jewishly by religion. Of this group 88% stated that they were also Jewish by Ethnic Origin, while 12% of this group identify with Jewish Religion alone or with some other Ethnic Origin (like Polish). Only 10% of the entire Jewish community said they had no religion and were Jewish by Ethnic Origin. Clearly, most Jews define themselves by religion.

Patterns of Jewish Identification

Of particular interest to Jewish communal planning are the percentage of Jews who identify only on the dimension of ethnicity. Overall, approximately 1 out of 10 Jews identifies only ethnically. There is, however, very great variation in this pattern. Montreal has the lowest rate of "nonreligious identification" at 4.5% and is followed closely by Toronto at 6.3%. Vancouver's rates, on the other hand, are close to 26%, and is followed by Halifax and Ottawa at 16% and 14% respectively.

A general argument has been put forward by various scholars and planners that ethnic identification connotes a weaker communal bond than religious identification. One way of testing this hypothesis is to examine the relationship between the percentage of Jews who identified only ethnically with the percentage of persons who we have not included in our Jewish definition – those who identify ethnically as Jews while identifying with a religion other than Jewish. The hypothesis would be that those communities which have higher percentages of "ethnic identifiers with no religion" would also have higher percentages of persons who identify ethnically as Jews "with another religion". This relationship could be seen as a continuum with religion representing the strongest Jewish bond and ethnic Jews with another religion indicating the weakest.

To test this relationship and for the purposes of this analysis alone, we added those persons who identify as Jews ethnically and with a religion other than Jewish to our total Jewish population. Remember that these individuals are not included in the basic Jewish definition. However, when we add these people in to the sample, we produce a national population with any form of Jewish identification of 405,955. Close to 50,000 persons identified with a religion other than Jewish while indicating at least part of their ethnicity to be Jewish.

We find a very direct relationship which supports this hypothesis: the greater the percentage of Jews who identify only along the ethnicity dimension, the higher the percentage of persons who identify ethnically as Jews with some other religion. Within this expanded concept, 12.2% identified ethnically as Jews with some other religion, and almost another 10% responded ethnically as Jews with no religion. The combined effect of these two weaker forms of identification is highest in Halifax and Vancouver (48% and 44% respectively) and lowest in Montreal and Toronto (9% and 13%). There is also a very strong correlation with intermarriage rates.

Intermarriage

Information on intermarriage was retrieved from the census by counting and analyzing the characteristics of the number of Jewish persons who lived in families where at least one parent was not Jewish by the standard definition utilized throughout this study. This definition is based on self reporting, and it is not possible in the census to distinguish between Jews by birth and those who became Jews by choice. Preliminary findings from the 1991 census indicate that intermarriage rates have gone up in every major Jewish centre. Nationally, 13% of all Jews lived in intermarried families, and they accounted for 46,000 persons. This represents an increase of 33% in the last ten years in relation to this important dimension of continuity.

If one looks at intermarriage rates only in relation to all persons in husband-wife families (as opposed to examining intermarriage as a percentage of the entire Jewish population – including persons living alone) the rates are not substantially higher. 16.4% of all Jewish persons living in husband-wife families, lived in a household where one spouse was not Jewish. The 1990 National Jewish Population Survey conducted by the Council of Jewish Federations found intermarriage rates much higher in the United States (28%).

These rates of intermarriage varied widely. Once again, Montreal had the lowest intermarriage rates at 6.8% and Vancouver had the highest rates at 24.5%. There is an inverse relationship between religious identification and intermarriage. That is, those communities where a higher percentage of Jews identified as Jews without religious affiliation also had higher rates of intermarriage.

What accounts for the dramatic differences and percentage change in intermarriage rates across Canada? It appears that size, institutional completeness, and population shifts have an important effect on these rates. The two largest Jewish centres have the lowest rates of intermarriage (Montreal, Toronto). Generally speaking, smaller Jewish population centres have higher rates of intermarriage.

It is difficult to reconcile two competing phenomena in relation to smaller Jewish communities. On the one hand, young Jews who wish to find Jewish partners leave small communities and move to bigger centres – leaving behind those persons who are more assimilated and less concerned about this issue. Simultaneously, in addition to Toronto, it has been the smaller communities which have experienced rapid growth. It is often young people who move to these centres, and they too may be less concerned about marrying another Jew. Sometimes the smallest of samples permits us to observe more clearly larger phenomena. Our data on communities with less than one hundred Jews point to intermarriage rates so high that often there is not a single family wherein both husband and wife are Jewish.

Institutional completeness refers to the number, variety and nature of institutions which a community has. Such institutions as schools, synagogues, community centres and the like serve as important communal reference points and provide opportunities for persons to meet and interact. The size of the community has an important impact on institutional completeness. Larger communities have more people and greater resources with which to support institutional life. Communities with a longer history are likely to have a greater repertoire of institutions. This helps to explain the low levels of intermarriage in Winnipeg – despite the fact that it has fewer Jews than Vancouver.

Rapidly developing communities have fewer institutional resources. Existing resources become strained in attempting to identify new members and to respond to their needs. Often persons who move to cities with small Jewish populations and few institutional resources do not prioritize their communal affiliation. At best, there is a considerable time lag before rapidly expanding communities can establish a more elaborate institutional framework. Thus, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton have very high rates of intermarriage and have experienced rapid growth within a relatively short historical period.

Those communities which have lost population (Montreal, Windsor and Winnipeg) have a higher percentage of elderly persons. Intermarriage rates are lower at the upper age ranges, and this also helps to explain lower rates of intermarriage in these cities.

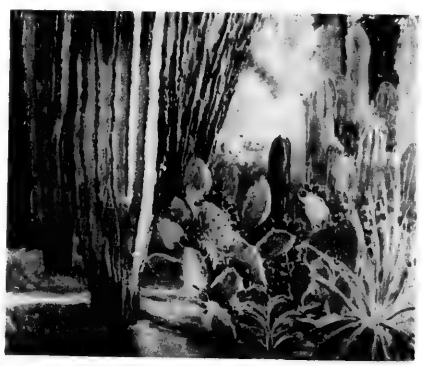
These regional differences are one distinguishing factor regarding continuity. Another difference worth noting concerns higher intermarriage rates among those persons currently between the ages of 25 and 40. Approximately 20% of all Jews in this age group are in intermarried relationships. For the 40 – 64 year old population, the percentage drops although we note interesting differences among men and women. 17% of men between the ages of 40 and 64 and 10% of women in this age group are in a couple where their spouse is not Jewish. We suspect that the higher percentage of men in this age category represent second marriages.

A central factor which reduces intermarriage rates is immigration. The impact of immigration on intermarriage rates is dramatic. Only 8% of all Jews who had immigrated to Canada in the last ten years lived in families where one of the partners was not Jewish.

Understanding the Challenge of Continuity in Canada

Clearly, continuity in Canada, while a serious issue, does not represent the same danger or level of threat to Canadian Jewry as it does to the American Jewish community. Why, then, has continuity been perceived in such draconian terms on the Canadian Jewish scene? We believe three sets of factors account for this.

First, the influence of American Jewry and the United States Federation network on Canadian Jewish life is immense. It is New York – not North York – which sets the Jewish agenda in North America and which frames the terms of reference for Jewish challenges. Canadians are often seen as northern extensions of American Jewish life. Where differences exist, they are quaint ones – bound to be rapidly folded into the patterns of American Jewish experience. When the Council of Jewish Federations in New York determines that there is a continuity crisis, it is immediately assumed that Canadian Jews experience the same.



"DESERT GARDEN #9" BY ANITA SHAPIRO, MONTREAL

Secondly, we believe that there exists a misunderstanding among scholars and researchers as to how to analyze and read Census data as it pertains to the issues of religious and ethnic affiliation. As stated earlier, data collected by Statistics Canada at the beginning of each decade is collected on both religious affiliation and ethnic ancestry. For the Jewish community in Canada, access to the data on religion is a key factor in being able to interpret the demographic characteristics of the Jewish community.

In the five year period between the large Census, Statistics Canada does a mid-Census. On this Census questionnaire, there is no question on religious identification. The only way for people to define their identity is through the variable Ethnic Origin. This poses many problems for a community that is defined for the most part by religion. We cannot assume that when asked only for Ethnic Origin, Jews will respond to the question as Jews. Certainly, it can be hypothesized that older Jews and immigrant Jews (both of whom make up a sizeable portion of our community) are not as familiar with the concept of Ethnicity as others might be. We have found, by analyzing preliminary data from 1991, that younger, Canadian born Jews are more likely to identify single or multiple ethnic origins than are older or immigrant Jews. We have also found many regional differences in patterns of Jewish identification, as explained earlier in this article. Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, for example, have sizeably lower percentages of Jews who identify solely on an ethnic affiliation basis-what has been called the secular or unaffiliated Jew. So for these communities especially, relying on data on Ethnic Origin alone will create lower total population counts and result in discrepancies in projections of Jewish population growth. This is best described by what occurred in Montreal around the 1986 data. The Montreal Jewish Federation (Federation CJA), based on data from the 1986 Census concluded that the population of Montreal was in serious decline. In fact, on reception of the 1991 data it was found that the total loss in population was only 2% – much less than was previously anticipated. Much fear was generated as a result of this original analysis.

Robert J. Brym in his article entitled "The Rise and Decline of Canadian Jewry? A Socio-Demographic Profile" (Brym, 1993) makes the same error in analysis. He compares two quite incomparable sets of data: 1981 and 1986 Census data. By comparing this data and looking solely at Ethnically identified Jews, he concludes that the community is in decline. If we compare 1981 and 1991 alone, without considering 1986 data we find the increase of the Jewish community at 14% overall. And if we look solely at Jews who identify by the Religion variable (an identifier which is considered strong by all) we find the community has increased from 296,425 to 318,070; this represents an increase of 6.8%! We believe that without having access to comparable data (i.e. 1981-1991), Brym's predictions as to the future of the Jewish community are inaccurate.

Leo Davids fell into the same well when comparing 1981 with 1986 data. In his article entitled "The Canadian Jewish Population: Today and Tomorrow" (Davids, 1989), Davids makes the prediction that Canada's ethnic Jewish population will be under 100,000 in the year 2050. There is no support for this proposition from a comparison of the 1981 – 1991 data.

Thirdly, the number of Jewish immigrants may have been underestimated and their contribution to the vitality of Canadian Jewish life may not have been properly assessed. The loss of people who leave a community is felt more immediately than the arrival of immigrants to a community. The former involves separating from persons with whom we have had relationships. The latter concerns establishing new ones. We, as a community, tend to be less aware of the significant role that immigrants play in the Jewish community and the extent to which Jews remain a community of immigrants. Immigration has had a strong counteractive impact on intermarriage as well as contributed to the increased number of Jewish children being raised in Canada. Clearly immigration continues to have a profound impact on the growth rate of the Canadian Jewish community and must be more seriously considered when making predictions of future population trends in the Jewish community in Canada.

Conclusion

To paraphrase Mark Twain, reports of the Jewish community's imminent demise have been greatly exaggerated. Clearly, the Jewish community in Canada is robust and vigorous and its drama of continuity continues to unfold – reshaping the demographic portfolio of Canadian Jewry.

Continuity, however, is a serious issue, and one which Jewish communal decision makers are geared up to confront. We make three specific recommendations to assist communal decision makers in responding to this challenge and to deal with, support and reach out to an increasingly diverse population.

First, national attention ought to be directed toward the rapidly expanding communities which have the highest rates of intermarriage as well as a significant influx of unaffiliated young persons. Assisting outreach efforts and institution building in these communities can be seen as a national Jewish imperative because it is in these communities that rates of intermarriage and disaffiliation are the highest.

Second, specific attention ought to be directed toward university campuses. It is here that marriage partners are often discovered, and it is at this age range where intermarriage rates begin to rise sharply. The extent to which Jewish institutional interventions on campus effect these relationships is not known, but there is sufficient evidence to suggest that these efforts should be critically reexamined.

Third, Jewish immigration is good for the Jews. Their demographic contributions are enormous. Efforts should be made to increase Jewish immigration to Canada from many places in the diaspora and to accelerate their integration into Jewish life.

Diaspora and Israeli Jews: One People or Two?

by Julien Bauer

Every decade or so, a major book emphasizes a question of importance for Jews. In the 60's it was La fin du people juif? (1965, The End of the Jewish People? 1967), by Georges Friedman, a French sociologist. For him, Diaspora Jews and Israelis were becoming more and more separate, the former going towards oblivion due to the decline of Orthodoxy and the growth of assimilation in the Diaspora, the latter becoming more and more nationalist, citizens of a State and less part of the Jewish People. Without being a Zionist, Friedman took for granted the inevitable erosion of the Diaspora and the normalization of Israel as a conventional State. He was cautious enough to maintain an interrogation mark on the title of his book.

Nearly thirty years later, we have to recognize that Friedman was basically right when he anticipated an increase in assimilation, a decrease in the number of Diaspora Jews (without taking alyah as a factor, more Jews are buried than born every day, except in Israel) but did not foresee the strength of Orthodoxy, which not only did not disappear but has become the only segment of Diaspora Jewry to experience a natural demographic growth.

The Waning of the Jewish People

In 1990, The Future of Jews by David Vital appeared. Compared to this book, Friedman is quite upbeat. The last words of Vital speak for themselves: "What is now before us is the waning of the Jewish nation".

According to Vital, the changes brought by emancipation, specifically assimilation and secularization, and by two more recent events, Holocaust and Israel, have led to a situation where "different communities of Jews have tended increasingly to inhabit different mental and philosophical worlds" (p. 39) and eventually to form "two classes of collectivities" (p. 115). Israelis live in a sovereign State, with all the attributes of power, including the "military card" (p. 31). Their leaders are elected and may be rejected, they will profit from or suffer the consequences of their political choices. On the other hand, Diaspora, and particularly U.S. Jewry, is a grouping of voluntary associations, without real political clout (they pressure, they do not decide), without an "ultimate authority" (p. 122), whose leaders are "self-selected" (p. 93), who will not suffer for any misguided policy as does its Israeli counterpart.

The basic difference between a Jewish community with political power through a State in Israel and voluntary organization within a State is compounded by the fact that Israel offers an alternative secular Jewish life (p. 114), whereas in the U.S. "only the firmly orthodox manage at least partly to resist the magnetic draw of the society that surrounds them" (p. 107). With an American Jewry who puts its "peace of mind" (p. 136) above Israel's needs, and an Israel who puts its national interests above Jewish interests, the likely result is the emergence of two Jewish peoples, one "part-time in its Jewish involvements" and one "relatively compact, bound together" in Israel (p. 142). As a result, "The survival of Jewry as a discrete people, its various branches bound to each other by common ties of culture, responsibility, and loyalty, is entirely in doubt" (pp. 146-147).

Friedman was a newcomer to the Jewish scene. Vital, author of books on Zionism, Israeli, involved in Jewish matters, seems to have been disillusioned by his U.S. experience. He finds the moral ground occupied by many Jewish critics of israeli policies ludicrous: They are advocating "moral" policies not followed by any State, potentially dangerous for Israel and its population, but they will not have to pay any price in case of failure. Compared to these Diaspora Jews who cannot differentiate between "private morality" and the "real world" (p. 99), who are at best irrelevant, at worst used by interests antagonistic to Israel, Israel "cannot fail to stand out as a tower of relative strength and political capability" (p. 124). In other words, the old Zionist idea of the ultimate disappearance of Diaspora Jewry is restated by Vital.

World Jewry has survived Friedman's prediction. Will it survive Vital's?

Political Power

Is political power the only major differentiating factor between Israeli and Diaspora Jews? As much as we agree on the differences between a State and voluntary Jewish organizations in the Diaspora, between their respective roles, capacities and duties, between Israeli democracy and Diaspora plutocracy, recent developments seem to have blurred the notion of political power. Another aspect of politics, long forgotten and disdained both here and there, is political ideology, without which no political power can survive for long.

It used to be that Israelis stressed the State as the vanguard of the Jewish People and that Diaspora Jews stressed their management of ethical-communal concerns. The rapprochement between Israel and the PLO flies against the idea of Israel as heir to the Jewish people. The only interests considered by the Rabin government are those of a normal State formulated by its government. There is no discernible connection linking present Israeli positions to Judaism or to the Jewish People. Regardless of the ultimate decision for Judea, Samaria and Gaza, not one official word has been uttered about the rights of the Jewish People on parts of the Land of Israel not included within the 1949 cease-fire lines. The Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron, where the founders of the Jewish People are buried, is not quoted in any agreement. According to Lipper, an official of the Department of Religious Affairs, Israel hopes that the Palestinian Arabs will allow Jews to pray at the Cave but has no guarantee. He even suggested the situation could go back to pre-1967, or rather pre-World War II, when Jews were not allowed further than the seventh step on the outside of the building. Jerusalem is to be negotiated in two years. The Washington text is quite clear: Arabs do have rights on Jerusalem, if not there would not be any planned negotiation on the future of Jerusalem; Jews have no rights on Hebron, if they had any it would have been hinted in the text. Whatever the pros and cons of such a policy, it is an official Israeli position. It can hardly be considered a Jewish position, either in the religious sense, Judaism, or the national one, Jewish People. The debate is raging in israel. So much for the "tower of strength" and the Israeli always increasing "the bounds of political identity" (p. 143).

"MOTHER & CHILD" BY MOE REINBLATT, MONTREAL, 1950

Ideology

On the other hand, Diaspora Jews are not as equivocal as Vital describes them to be. They are more polarized than ever, a proof that ideology made a comeback and is alive and well. Many local "potentates", reigning over Jewish institutions in the U.S., Canada, Great Britain etc., those whose Jewish ideological involvement is minimal, be it religious, Zionist, cultural..., are supporting Rabin's initiative. By doing so, they keep a good relationship with both Israeli and local U.S., Canadian or British political leaders. Jews who are obsessed by continuity, many of them Orthodox, who stress Jewish education and knowledge of Jewish history, who are more prone to live eventually in Israel, are either sceptical of or opposed to the Israeli Government's position. They relate to Judaism and Jewish rights more than to State interests. This group, underrepresented at the leadership level, is a growing element in a decreasing Diaspora. They have more children, retain a larger number of them within the Jewish People, are moving from anachronistic marginal groups on the periphery towards the core of Jewish communities. They have no political power but they do have a political ideology: namely, the permanence of the Jewish People as a goal in itself.

Whose Interests?

The dividing line continues to be between those living in a sovereign State and those living as minorities in non-Jewish States. A new line is emerging, or re-emerging, an ideological one. Some, be they Israeli or Diaspora Jews, will stress mostly State interests; others, both in Israel and Diaspora, will emphasize Jewish interests.

This new phenomenon is recognized by people with intricate knowledge of both Jewish peoples(as Vital would have it). For example, Emanuel Rackman (Jewish Week, Nov. 12, 1993) has suggested the formation of a Jewish international consultative council, composed of Israeli and Diaspora Jews, to advise the Israeli government who would assume sole responsibility for the decisions.

Power as embodied in the State was prepared by Zionist ideology. Friedman and Vital converge in their views: Only the powerful section of the Jewish People, Israeli Jewry, will remain – the powerless Diaspora Jewry is doomed to erosion and ultimate disappearance. This is the Jewish version of Fukuyamo's idea of "the end of history", of the irrelevance of ideological debates.

I suggest another approach. In a democracy, without a consensus based on ideological agreement, power is fragile. The Jewish People, including its Diaspora element, needs the State as a source of physical power to assure its physical survival; the Jewish People, including its Israeli element, needs ideological commitment to assure keeping a raison d'être. Those who want the history of the Jewish People to continue have no choice but to try experimenting with new combinations of power and ideology, of Statism and Jewishness. Could it be that in twenty years another book will explain why the anticipated end of the Jewish People did not come to pass?

Reflections On A Retreat

by Monica Shapiro

At the end of the CJA Leadership Retreat in August 1993 we were invited to talk about our thoughts and feelings of the four days we had spent together. What follows are the reflections I shared with the people on our retreat.

Retreat '93

Our retreat began Wednesday night after sunset. It was to be a weekend of Jewish identity and leadership training. As we stood on the beach at Camp B'nai Brith, Rabbi Shoham explained how fitting a beginning it was. "According to Bereshit," he said, "the world for Jews begins at night." As he spoke, torches were lit in four canoes out on the lake, and our young people paddled to shore. Bringing light to the beach. Symbolizing the waves of immigration just before the State of Israel was created. "First there was darkness, and then there was light," he continued, "because only after hardship comes light... not vice versa." In many ways, I feel that I have been in the dark for much of my life. This retreat weekend has done much to illuminate my journey as a Jew.

Later that same night Rabbi Poupko talked to us about the importance of our history. Of our communal stories as well as our individual stories. Because they tell us where we are coming from so that we can know where we are going. This theme was repeated by our other speakers, Frank Hegelberg, Malcom Hoenlein and Rony Medzini during the weekend. I would like to continue it by sharing with you a story that belongs to all of us. A story that happened in the years before Israel was born. And then I'd like to offer to you a personal story of mine to add to our joint stories of who we are as Jews. Because all our stories become our heritage. Standing behind us, giving us strength.

My first story is about boats. As we stood on the beach on Wednesday night, with our beautiful young people coming ashore in lighted canoes, an image from our collective past came to me. On the road to Haifa there is a monument consisting of the battered bow of a ship reaching out to the sea. The story it tells is that in 1939 and 1940, many illegal boats came to Palestine bringing refugees fleeing from Hitler. When a ship was spotted on the horizon, a bell was sounded on land and all the members of the nearby Kibbutzim would rush down to the beach to mingle with the newcomers as soon as they waded ashore, so that the British would not be able to tell who were kibbutzniks and who were refugees, and therefore could not arrest the illegal immigrants. On Wednesday night I felt as if I was similarly being welcomed into a community of Jews – all of you – who would make me feel one with them. And I thank you deeply for that.

My second story is also about a boat. A personal memory that also came to me on the beach Wednesday night. My uncle, my mother's only surviving relative, came to Palestine on one of those illegal ships. It was called the Patria. And it sank before the passengers could reach the shore. But my uncle survived because there was a small pocket of air that became trapped at the ceiling of his cabin. He managed to stay alive by breathing this air until he was rescued. In some ways I feel as if I have been breathing a small pocket of air, and have missed out on the richness of my Jewish heritage. In some ways the cabin of my life has been small. I too have survived, but it is experiences like this retreat that help me reclaim my Jewish soul.

Listening and learning from Frank, Malcom, Rony, Arna, Rabbi Shoham and Rabbi Poupko, as well as from all of you, younger ones and older ones alike, has been a truly expanding experience for me. For my Jewish mind and my Jewish spirit. I thank my husband Barry for always being with me when I grow. And I thank you all for helping me become a proud Lion of Judah.

Epilogue

The morning after I told my stories, Rony our resident scholar from Israel, approached me. "You know, Monica," he said gently, "I remember those boats. I was a boy of eight in 1939, and I would lie in the dunes above the beach watching those boats arrive, and the people wading ashore. It was so exciting for us all. I still remember seeing people jump from the deck into the sea. One day I heard that a boat had arrived, and that it sank and 257 people drowned. I asked my parents what happened, but none of the adults would talk about it. I learned much later, when I grew up, that it was called the Patria and it had been sunk by the Hagganah because they knew that the British planned to sent it on to Mauritius. But the Hagganah leaders didn't realize it was such an old ship and they overestimated the amount of dynamite needed to sink it. Instead they blew it up, killing most of the passengers. Your uncle was one of the very few survivors."

I started to tremble as he told me his story. This stranger I only met for the first time this weekend. "You were there the day my uncle survived," I said, "before I was even born, you knew what I would one day be told. In a way you were closer to it, even though I thought it was only my story."

At that moment I knew that Rony is part of my history. He witnessed what I only heard as words, and he completed my story by giving me details about my uncle that I never knew. Because his story is mine, and my story is ours. Because we as Jews have a thread that binds us together. Our history. And Rony and I are a living example of that.

POETRY

Gaberdine

Sabbath-breaker, I pass them in my car as they walk beneath a sweet suburban sun.
Aside from storefront English
one might think that this is Lublin, circa 1936, before the grave events burned in us those questions that seem to make their dress irrelevant:

the aristocrat's fur hat proclaiming man-in-God is noble;
the earlocks reaching out like a stem's believing tendril; knee-high, page white stockings and the shining gaberdine – deep beyond the darkest ink.

I love that student in the tale,
the one desiring grace,
who sought his Master not for Torah but to watch him tie his shoelace!
Gesture. Nuance. Revelation in the movement of a hand.
Layers in the simplest narrative.

That world has vanished,
and these, the remnant,
anachronistic yet ecstatic, carry the word upon their lips while we who have been given the illusion of direction stay lost in the flow of traffic.

The Cold

In this country the cold drives people inside.
Their houses swallow them.
The furnace churns and they sit in the warm belly of the great house bear, filled with a private odour.
When they venture out they wear strange hats or ear muffs and resemble ridiculous animals.
They flap their arms to keep warm like people-sized birds.

In summer they emerge
but you can see the winter has not left them. You see it in their faces, their movements, in the way they greet one another, tentatively, as if there may not be another summer and winter will last and last like a condition that is chronic.

But they don't walk to the clinic.
They accept it
the way their ancestors once accepted God – without singing, without celebration and in August, in the wilderness, they stare in amazement

at the profusion of green and accept the naked silence as a hymn.

Serves 4

In this recipe, teriyaki sauce and Ontario peaches team up with chicken and snow peas for a colorful and nutritious stir-fry.

Be sure to have all ingredients sliced, diced or minced in advance. Stir-frying is such a fast method of cooking that once it begins, there is no time to do anything else. In addition to saving time, stir-frying preserves the nutrients, flavors, textures and colors of all the ingredients.

¼ cup cornstarch
1 tbsp. kosher teriyaki sauce
1 clove garlic, minced
2 chicken breasts (about 1 lb.) skinned, boned and cut into strips
1 can chicken broth
⅓ cup kosher teriyaki sauce
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tbsp. minced fresh gingerroot
1 medium onion, cut in chunks and separated
4 oz. snow peas, halved lengthwise
4 medium peaches, peeled, pitted and sliced toasted sliced almonds hot cooked rice or Oriental noodles

In medium bowl, combine 1 tbsp. of the cornstarch, 1 tbsp. teriyaki sauce, garlic and chicken; let stand 15 min. Meanwhile, combine remaining cornstarch, chicken broth and ⅓ cup teriyaki sauce; set aside.

Heat 2 tbsp. of the oil in hot wok or large skillet over high heat; stir-fry chicken 3 min., remove. Heat remaining oil in same pan; stir-fry ginger and onion for 3 min. Add snow peas and stir-fry 3 min. Add chicken, teriyaki sauce mixture and peaches to pan. Cook, stirring, until sauce boils and thickens and peaches are heated through.

Garnish with sliced almonds. Serve with hot cooked rice or noodles.

COCONUTTY PEACH CREME BRULEE
Serves 6

A classic dessert is simplified in this delicious cocunutty peach version of creme brulee. Prepare the peaches and pudding earlier in the day if you like (or even the night before), then combine the topping and broil just before serving. it's a real treat.

1 pkg. kosher vanilla pudding mix
2½ cups milk
6 medium peaches, peeled, halved and pitted
½ cup kosher peach schnapps
¾ cup flaked coconut
¼ cup packed brown sugar
2 tbsp. butter, softened
¼ tsp. cinnamon

Cook pudding according to package directions, using 2½ cups milk. Place plastic wrap directly on surface; set aside.

In large frypan, bring peaches and peach schnapps to boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer 15 min. Drain, reserving liquid. Place peaches in 9 in. fluted quiche dish. Stir reserved peach liquid into pudding; pour over peaches. Cover and chill.

Just before serving, combine coconut, brown sugar, butter and cinnamon; sprinkle evenly over pudding. Broil 4 in. from heat for 1 or 2 min., or until topping is crisp and golden brown. Serve immediately.

FRESH FRUIT SORBETS

Combine the luscious taste of Ontario fruits in these easy frozen sorbets. Start with the individual fruit variations listed below, then try mixing and matching fruits to create your own unique combinations. Be sure to taste the fruit mixture before freezing and adjust the sweetness level to suit your family's preference.

Pureed fruit (see amounts below)
½ cup liquid honey
¼ cup white corn syrup

Combine pureed fruit, honey and corn syrup; chill until very cold. Stir well and pour into ice-cream maker. Freeze according to manufacturer's directions. Makes about 2⅔ cups.

Peach Sorbet: 3½ cups halved, pitted peaches (about 8 medium), pureed

Raspberry Sorbet: 2½ cups raspberries, pureed and sieved

Red Currant Sorbet: 3½ cups red currants, pureed and sieved

Plum Sorbet: 3 cups halved, pitted blue or prune plums (about 8 blue or 15 prune), cooked and pureed

Blackberry Sorbet: 5 cups blackberries, pureed and sieved.

Keep your cool during the hectic holiday season with flavorful desserts like peach, raspberry or plum sorbet. Nothing ends a festive meal more simply or magically.

Holidays sweet for diabetics too

During the High Holy day season, the eating of sweet foods is an important part of the celebration.

Newspapers (including this one!), magazines and cookbooks abound with recipes using honey, fruits and sugar.

What, then, do diabetics do to take part in the culinary enjoyment of these days?

Esther Schwartz, founder and director of the Jewish Diabetes group of the Canadian Diabetic Association, prepared these recipes for the organization. They are delicious and festive, while adhering to dietary requirements.

Come to think of it, they are great for anyone watching their diet and who isn't these days?

RATATOUILLE
Serves 10

Delicious either hot or cold. Freezes well. Best if made day before. Garnish with chopped parsley.

- 3 tbsp. drained liquid from can tomatoes (see below)
- 2 large garlic cloves, crushed
- 2 large onions, thinly sliced
- 2 medium zucchini, sliced
- 1 medium egg plant, cut into cubes
- 3 tbsp. flour
- 1 green pepper, 1 red pepper (seeded and cut into strips)
- 19 oz. can kosher stewed tomatoes drained (see above)
- ¼ tsp. each oregano, basil, marjoram and rosemary

Heat liquid from tomatoes in large frying pan. Saute garlic and onions until soft and transparent. Sprinkle flour over remaining vegetables; add to frying pan. Add tomatoes and seasonings. Cover and cook over low heat for 1 hour. Uncover and cook until mixture is thick. Garnish with chopped parsley.

Each serving: ½ cup. One fruits and vegetables exchange: 11 g. carbohydrate, 2 g. protein, 52 calories.

LO-CAL FRENCH DRESSING

Use with any fresh salad.

- ½ cup tomato juice
- ½ cup vinegar
- ¼ tsp. dry mustard
- 1/8 tsp. oregano
- 1 small garlic clove, crushed
- 6 drops liquid sweetener, kosher
- ¼ tsp. salt
- 1/8 tsp. pepper

Combine all ingredients in a jar, blender or food processor. Keep refrigerated in a jar.

Makes 1 cup. Each serving: 1 tablespoon 1+ + extra 1 g. carbohydrate, 0 g. protein, 0 g. fat, 4 calories.

SWEET AND SOUR HOLISHKES

Makes 30

Part 1 - Cabbage

- 5 lbs cabbage (1 loose head)
- 2 lbs ground chuck (lean)
- 1 onion, medium
- 1 garlic clove, pressed
- 1 tsp salt
- ½ tsp pepper
- ½ cup stock or water
- 2 tsp prepared mustard
- ¼ cup ketchup
- 1 tsp H.P. Sauce
- ½ cup long grain rice (raw)

Sauce:

- 1 can (28oz) tomatoes
- 2 cans tomato-mushroom sauce (11 oz)
- ½ cup brown sugar replacement, kosher*
- ¼ cup juice of 1 lemon

* If you can't find kosher brown sugar replacement, use white sugar replacement.

Place cabbage in a plastic bag in freezer at least 2 days before preparing cabbage rolls. Remove cabbage from freezer the night before you intend to make the cabbage rolls. Remove from bag and sit in colander in sink. In the morning, core the cabbage. The leaves will separate easily. Dry with paper towels to remove excess moisture.

Combine all ingredients for stuffing, mixing well. Place a heaping tablespoon of mixture near the stem end on each leaf. Fold the stem end over the meat, then the two sides. Roll up firmly.

Combine sauce ingredients.

Shred the core and any leftover cabbage. In a Dutch oven, place a layer of shredded cabbage, a layer of the rolls, seam side down, side by side, tightly packed, and a layer of sauce. Repeat until all is used. Simmer gently for 2 hours on top of stove, tightly covered.

Preheat oven to 275°F. Sprinkle with paprika. Place in oven, uncovered. Bake 2 hours. Freezes well.

Each serving: 1 cabbage roll: 1 protein choice

½ starchy choice 8 g. carb. 8 g. protein 3 g. fat 91 calories

APPLE CRUNCH
(12 Servings)

- 6 medium cooking apples, peeled and sliced
- 1 tbsp. kosher brown sugar replacement
- 1 tsp. cinnamon
- ½ cup flour (all purpose)
- ¼ cup brown sugar replacement
- ½ cup oatmeal (quick rolled oats)
- ½ cup pareve diet margarine

Preheat oven to 425°F. Spray a 20 x 5 cm (8''x8'') baking pan with non-stick spray. Layer apples around bottom of pan. Mix 1 tbsp. brown sugar replacement with cinnamon. Sprinkle over apples. Mix together the flour, brown sugar replacement and oatmeal. Cut in margarine with knife or pastry cutter. Rub with finger tips. Spread over apples. Bake 30 minutes. Cut into 12 squares.

Each serving: ½ Starchy Choice 1 g. protein. 1 Fruits and Vegetables Choice 16 g. carbohydrate. 1 Fats and Oils Choice 4 g. fat 106 calories.

Rosh Hashanah Next Week in The Canadian Jewish news

One-pot casseroles are easy for Sukkot

By LESLYE MICHLIN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

Tradition advises that the appropriate observance of Sukkot includes eating as many meals as possible in the sukkah.

Since carrying meals outside is inconvenient, Jewish homemaking somewhere along the way decided to serve one-pot meals and casseroles in the sukkah. Stuffed cabbage is a longstanding favorite one-pot meal.

As most Jews in the United States came from East Europe, Eastern European style sweet and sour stuffed cabbage has become identified with Sukkot. Yet Jews have lived almost everywhere on Earth and there is no reason to confine stuffed cabbage recipes to only one small area.

Wherever Jews have lived, they have adapted their cooking style to local conditions and ingredients. This makes Middle Eastern, Italian, and even Chinese recipes just as appropriate.

The original recipes called for ground beef fillings. In the interest of lowering fat and cholesterol, use ground 100 per cent white meat turkey instead of lean ground beef. There is a dramatic difference between the two. Only 1 to 3 per cent of total calories come from fat when you fill the cabbage with 100 per cent ground white meat. When you use lean ground beef, 33 to 49 per cent of total calories come from fat.

Even though ground turkey is naturally less tasty than ground beef, the fillings are all seasoned so well you won't consider any version bland.

Prepare stuffed cabbage this Sukkot. Your friends and family will enjoy it whether you make the traditional East European, or the more exotic Middle Eastern, Italian, or even Chinese cabbage rolls.

The idea that Jews have lived in so many places throughout the world may spark interesting conversations about Jewish history. This is an awesome responsibility for the lowly cabbage, but with these recipes, it can handle it with ease.

EASTERN EUROPEAN STUFFED CABBAGE

15 large cabbage leaves, wilted
Filling:
1 pound ground 100% white meat turkey breast
OR 1 pound lean ground beef
1 small onion
1 clove garlic
¼ cup uncooked rice
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon ground black pepper
Sauce:
¼ cup fresh lemon juice
½ cup brown sugar, loosely packed
8-ounce can (low-sodium) tomato sauce

Drain the cabbage from the water.

Place meat, onion, and garlic in food processor bowl. Process briefly. Add the rice, salt and pepper and process again, just until ingredients combine well.

Divide the meat mixture into 15. Place a portion of the meat mixture in the centre of one leaf. Fold the bottom of the leaf over the meat, then fold in the sides. Turn once more to complete the package. Do the same with the rest of the leaves.

Arrange the filled cabbage rolls in a wide, shallow pot that has a tightly fitting lid.

Combine the sauce ingredients. Pour the sauce over the cabbage rolls in the pot. Add water, almost to the top of the rolls. Cover and bring to a boil, then simmer, covered, for 30 minutes.

Heat oven to 350 degrees.

Remove the lid from the pot on the stove. Place the pot in the oven. Bake for 30-40 minutes, until the rolls look brown on the top. Turn them and bake another 30-40 minutes, or until the cabbage is tender.

Makes 15 large rolls.

MIDDLE EASTERN STUFFED CABBAGE

15 large cabbage leaves, wilted
Filling:
1 pound ground 100% white meat turkey breast
OR 1 pound lean ground beef
4 tbsp, fresh parsley, chopped
½ cup uncooked rice
1 8-ounce can (low-sodium) tomato sauce
1 tsp. salt
freshly ground black pepper to taste
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
Topping: juice of 1 lemon
salt water
pinch of kosher saffron

Drain the cabbage from the water.

Place meat and parsley in food processor. Process briefly. Add the rice, tomato sauce, salt, pepper and cinnamon and process until well blended.

Line a large pot with torn cabbage leaves.

Divide the meat mixture into 15. Place a portion of the filling in the centre of a cabbage leaf. Fold the sides in toward the centre, and then roll over to close. Continue until you fill all the leaves.

Lay the cabbage rolls in the prepared pot, in layers, if necessary. Pour the lemon juice over them. Add water, almost to cover, and a little salt. Dissolve a pinch of saffron in ½ cup water and pour it over the rolls. Cover and cook at the simmer for 30 minutes.

Heat oven to 350 degrees.

Remove lid from the pot. Place in oven and bake for 30 minutes. Turn the roll and continue baking 30 more minutes, or until cabbage is tender.

Makes 15 large rolls.

Italian stuffed cabbage

ITALIAN STUFFED CABBAGE

15 large cabbage leaves, wilted
Filling:
1 lb. ground 100% white meat turkey breast
OR 1 lb. lean ground beef
1 small garlic clove
2 tbsp. fresh (Italian) parsley
½ cup no fat egg substitute (equal tol 2 eggs)
¼ cup unseasoned bread crumbs
¼ cup no-fat chicken stock
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. ground black pepper
Sauce:
¼ cup no-fat chicken stock
1 garlic clove, peeled and sliced
1 16-ounce can ripe tomatoes, chopped
1 8-ounce can (low-sodium) tomato sauce
water
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
additional fresh (Italian) parsley, chopped, for garnish

Drain the cabbage from the water

Place the meat, garlic, and parsley in food processor bowl. Process briefly. Add the egg substitute, bread crumbs, stock, salt and pepper and process again, just until ingredients combine.

Divide the meat mixture into 15 parts. Place a portion of the meat in the centre of a cabbage leaf. Fold in the sides and turn, like wrapping a package. Repeat this process with the rest of the meat and leaves.

Line a pot with a tightly fitting lid with some of the torn or too small cabbage leaves. Sprinkle with sliced garlic and ½ cup no-fat stock. Arrange the prepared rolls in the prepared pot. Combine the tomatoes, tomato sauce, water, salt, and pepper. Pour this over the rolls. Simmer, covered, for 30 minutes.

Heat oven to 350 degrees.

Remove the lid. Bake, uncovered, for 30 minutes. Turn and bake 15 minutes longer. Sprinkle with parsley and continue cooking about 15 more minutes, or until the cabbage is tender.

Makes 15 large rolls.

CHINESE CABBAGE ROLLS

BISTRO CHICKEN WITH FRESH TOMATOES

9 medium tomatoes, about 3 lb.
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 chicken, about 4 lb. cut into serving pieces
4 medium onions, about 1½ lb.
6 large cloves garlic
1¼ cups kosher red wine
1/3 cup tomato paste
1 tbsp. brown sugar
2 tsp. dried tarragon
¾ tsp. each dried leaf thyme and salt
¼ tsp. each cayenne and white or black pepper
3 stalks celery, finely chopped

Core tomatoes; cut shallow "X" on bottoms. Plunge into boiling water 1 or 2 mins.; drain and cool in cold water. Peel and set aside.

In wide deep saucepan, heat oil over medium-high heat; cook chicken in batches until golden, about 5 mins. per side. Remove and set aside.

Meanwhile, peel onions and cut into eighths. Peel and coarsely chop garlic, to make about ¼ cup (50 mL). Add onions to pan; stir over low heat about 1 min., scraping up any brown bits. Add garlic and cook, stirring, 1 min. Add 1 cup (250 mL) of the wine and increase heat to medium; boil gently, stirring often, until reduced by half.

Meanwhile, coarsely chop tomatoes; add to pan along with tomato paste, sugar, tarragon, thyme, salt, cayenne and pepper. Add chicken, submerging in sauce. Cover tightly and simmer over low heat, stirring occasionally, 35 mins. Add celery; cook 10 min. or until chicken is tender and celery is still crunchy. Taste and add remaining wine, if desired. Serves 4 to 6.

Lowfat vegetarian cooking is anything but boring

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

So you think that vegetarian cooking is boring? That vegetarian food is yucky? That low-fat vegetarian cooking must be both boring and yucky?

Just dip into The Lowfat Jewish Vegetarian Cookbook; healthy traditions from around the world, by Debra Wasserman (Vegetarian Resource Group, 1994).

Salads, stews, desserts, soups — you can find something delicious here for any meal. Wasserman has even put in a section with suggested menus for Jewish holidays. A broccoli and lemon dish or Russian charoset with pears, apricots and almonds do a lot to take some of the unpleasantness out of Pesach. And in a healthy way, too.

There are also suggested ideas for breakfasts, lunches, and away-from-home meals.

Another feature is suggested recipes high in calcium, such as Israeli beans with apples or Greek okra stew; and in iron, like Moroccan chickpea and lentil soup.

A chapter on dealing with fat in your diet is especially interesting; it offers a simple yet understandable way of figuring out your diet.

Recipes are by and large easy to prepare, and use readily available ingredients.

The Vegetarian Resource Group has a whole list of terrific publications, including cookbooks, a journal (Vegetarian Journal), a computer game, and informational material on vegetarianism and health.

For more information, or to order any of their publications (including The Lowfat Jewish Vegetarian Cookbook) write The Vegetarian Resource Group, P.O. Box 1463, Baltimore, Md. 21203.

Here are a few recipes from their suggested Rosh Hashanah menus. It's nice to prepare foods that are not just delicious, but healthy too.

YEMENITE BREAD SALAD
(Serves 10)

6 small whole wheat pita breads (or 3 large)
1 lb. romaine lettuce, torn into bite-sized pieces, and washed very well
2 green onions, finely chopped
1 cucumber, peeled and cubed
2 ripe tomatoes, chopped
½ cup fresh parsley, minced
1 tbsp.dried mint
2 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup olive oil
1 chili pepper, finely chopped (opt.)

Cut pita bread into bite-size pieces, and toast in oven or under broiler for a few minutes.

Toss lettuce, green onions, cucumber, tomato, parsley and mint in a large bowl. Add lemon juice and olive oil. Toss again. Add bread right before serving and toss one more time.

NORTH AFRICAN BARLEY PUDDING
Serves 5
A nice change from rice pudding

1 cup barley, uncooked
3½ cups water
1 tbsp. pine nuts
1 tbsp. slivered almonds
1 tbsp. pistachios
1 cup kosher maple syrup

Cook barley in water in a large pot over medium heat for 1 to 1½ hours, until very soft. Stir in remaining ingredients and continue heating for 2 minutes, stirring constantly. Serve warm or chilled.

Peaches and tomatoes popular for canning

Peaches and tomatoes remain the most popular foods for home canning. So what's so news worthy about these traditional favorites this year? New flavor, says Bernardin of Canada Ltd.

Put some punch in your home canned peaches this year. Juicy, succulent peaches blend well with herbs, spirits or even hot peppers to yield delightful new taste experiences. Putting up a few jars of unique peach preserves now is a great way to enjoy the taste of summer when the snow flies.

"Remember that all home canned peach recipes must be processed in a boiling water canner to prevent spoilage," says Mary Bewick, home economist for Bernardin, Canada's home canning expert. "Processing also helps assure top taste quality and stability at room temperature," she says.

When purchasing peaches, it's best to can them within 12 to 24 hours of buying. If you pick your own peaches, let them stand one to two days at room temperature before canning. To peel peaches, blanch them in boiling water for 30 to 60 seconds, transfer to ice cold water and slip off the skins.

Tomatoes are easy to preserve in jars, according to Bewick. Bewick recommends adding different spice blends to home canned tomatoes. Seasoned tomatoes add new life to favorite recipes and help speed recipe preparation. The tested recipe below provides three unique seasoning options. Make all six or two jars of three different flavors.

The most important factor to remember when canning is that tomatoes must be processed in a boiling water canner, Bewick says. Processing destroys micro-organisms that can cause food spoilage and exhaust air from the jar so that, upon cooling, the lid "snaps" onto the jar forming a strong vacuum seal. Spaghetti sauces and tomato mixtures that include meat must be processed in a pressure canner.

When choosing tomatoes for home canning, select firm ripe tomatoes that are free of surface imperfections. Blemishes, bruises or cracks on the surface may cause spoilage of canned foods. For best results use vine-ripened tomatoes. Do not can tomatoes from dead or frost-killed vines. Tomatoes that are heavy for their size will be the juiciest.

Blanching allows easy peeling of tomatoes. To blanch; submerge tomatoes in boiling water for 30 to 60 seconds, then submerge them in ice cold water for 30 to 60 seconds. Skins will slip off easily.

PERFECT PEACH JAM

5 cups (3½ lbs.) peeled and chopped peaches, (about 21 peaches)
2 tbsp. (30 mL) lemon juice
3½ cups (875 mL) granulated sugar
1 box (49 g) kosher "light" fruit pectin crystals

Fill boiling water canner with water. Place six clean half-pint (250 mL) mason jars in canner over high heat. Cover, bring water to a boil; boil at least 10 minutes to sterilize jars at altitudes up to 1,000 feet.

Place snap lids in boiling water; boil five minutes to soften sealing compound.

Combine peaches and lemon juice in a large stainless steel or enamel saucepan.

Measure sugar and set aside. Combine light fruit pectin crystals with ¼ cup of the sugar; slowly stir into fruit until very well mixed.

Place saucepan over high heat; stir constantly until mixture comes to a boil and crystals are dissolved. Add remaining sugar; continue stirring until mixture returns to a full boil. Boil vigorously one minute, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; skim off foam with metal spoon.

Ladle jam into a hot sterilized jar to within ¼ inch of top rim. Remove air bubbles by sliding a rubber spatula between glass and jam. Wipe jar rim to remove any stickiness. Centre snap lid on jar; apply screw band just until fingertip tight. Place jar in canner. Repeat for remaining jam.

Cover canner; return water to a boil; process five minutes at altitudes up to 1,000 feet. Remove jars. Cool 24 hours. Check jar seals. Sealed lids curve downward. Remove screw bands; store separately. Wipe jars, label and store in a cool, dark place.

Makes six half-pint (250 mL) jars.

MINTED PEACH BOURBON JAM

With the addition of bourbon and mint, this jam becomes a wonderful gourmet specialty. Prepare Perfect Peach Jam recipe as directed. Just before filling jars, stir in six tablespoons bourbon and one teaspoon mint extract, then return jam to heat. Boil five minutes and remove from heat; ladle into jars as directed. Makes six to seven half-pint jars.

PEACH SALSA

Tired of tomato-based salsas? Try combining the mellow flavor of peaches with hot, spicy ingredients for a unique, colorful condiment. Serve it with nachos or grilled entrees.

6 cups peeled and chopped peaches (about 12 medium)
1¼ cups chopped red onion
1 red pepper, chopped
4 jalapeno peppers*
½ cup chopped fresh cilantro or coriander
1 clove garlic, finely chopped
2 tbsp liquid honey
½ cup vinegar
1½ tsp. ground cumin
½ tsp. cayenne pepper

*Wear rubber gloves when handling jalapeno peppers.

Fill boiling water canner with water. Place eight clean half-pint mason jars in canner over high heat.

Place snap lids in boiling water; boil five minutes to soften sealing compound.

Combine all ingredients in a large, deep stainless steel saucepan. Stirring continuously to prevent scorching, bring to a boil. Reduce heat; boil gently, stirring frequently, five minutes.

Ladle salsa into a hot sterilized jar to within ¼ inch of top rim. Remove air bubbles by sliding a rubber spatula between glass and salsa. Wipe jar rim to remove any stickiness. Centre snap lid on jar; apply screw band just until fingertip tight. Place jar in canner. Repeat for remaining salsa.

Cover canner; return water to a boil; process 10 minutes at altitudes up to 1,000 feet. Remove jars. Cool 24 hours. Check jar seals. Sealed lids curve downward. Remove screw bands; store. Wipe jars, label and store in a cool, dark place.

Makes seven to eight half-pint jars.

SEASONED TOMATOES

12 large ripe tomatoes
Spice blend(s) (recipes below)
Lemon juice
Salt

Fill boiling water canner with water. Place six pint mason jars in canner over high heat.

Dip tomatoes in boiling water for 30 to 60 seconds then plunge into ice cold water. Slip off skins; cut tomatoes in half and place in a large, deep stainless steel or enamel saucepan. Add just enough water to cover tomatoes; bring to a boil. Boil five minutes.

Place snap lids in boiling water; boil five minutes to soften sealing compound.

In a hot jar, place specified quantity of chosen spice blend, 1 tbsp. lemon juice and ¼ tsp. salt. Pack tomatoes snugly into jar to within ¾ inch of top rim. Add boiling water (or tomato cooking liquid) to cover tomatoes to within ½ inch of top rim. Remove air bubbles by sliding a rubber spatula between glass and tomatoes. Wipe jar rim. Centre snap lid on jar; apply screw band just until fingertip tight. Place jar in canner. Repeat for remaining tomatoes.

Cover canner; return water to a boil; process 40 minutes at altitudes up to 1,000 feet. Remove jars. Cool 24 hours. Check jar seals. Sealed lids curve downward. Remove screw bands; store separately. Wipe jars, label and store in a cool, dark place.

Makes six pint jars.

HONEY ROASTED CAPON with Kasha/Fruit Stuffing
Serves 6

1 capon - 7 to 8 lbs - wash and dry

Honey Mixture:
3 tbsp olive oil
4 tbsp orange juice
4 tbsp honey (buckwheat honey when available)
Grated zest of 1 orange and 1 lemon
1 tbsp paprika

Combine all ingredients and brush capon inside and out. Reserve any leftover mixture.

Stuffing:
1 egg
1½ cups medium kasha
3 cups water or chicken stock
1 tsp salt
¼ tsp pepper
1 apple, peeled & finely chopped
¼ cup finely cut dried apricots
¼ cup finely cut dried prunes (optional)
1 medium onion, finely chopped

Beat egg into dry kasha. Cook on low heat, stirring constantly until mixture dries. Add water or stock. Cover and cook until liquid is absorbed. Add salt, pepper, apple, apricots, prunes and onions. Mix well.

Preheat oven to 350ºF. Lightly stuff capon with kasha mixture. Skewer across the opening and lace with string. Tie the drumsticks together with string and tuck the wings behind the back. Place breast side up on a rack in a shallow roasting pan. Roast for approximately 2 hours, basting frequently with reserved honey mixture or until skin is crisp and juices run clear when thigh is pierced. Remove skewers and string. Transfer to serving platter and let stand 10 minutes before carving.

COLORFUL SNOW PEA SALAD
½ lb snow peas or sugar peas, trimmed, strings removed ½ lb mushrooms, thinly sliced
1 large red, yellow or orange pepper, cut into strips

Blanch peas in boiling water for 1 minute or until they turn bright green. Drain and plunge into ice water. Dry well on paper towels. Cool. Cut in half on slight diagonal and place in salad bowl with the mushrooms and peppers. Toss with dressing just before serving.

Dressing:
½ tsp grated orange rind
¼ cup orange juice
¼ cup olive oil
1 clove garlic, crushed
2 tbsp cider or white vinegar
2 tsp sugar
1 tbsp lemon juice
¼ tsp salt
1/8 tsp salt
1/8 tsp pepper

Combine and thoroughly blend all ingredients in food processor. Chill for at least 1 hour and pour over vegetables just before serving.

HONEY FRUIT CAKE
Yield: 1 tube cake or 2 loaf cakes

Preheat oven to 250 F.
½ cup dried prunes
½ cup dried apricots

Cover with boiling water. Let stand 5 minutes. Drain and slice.
½ cup margarine or vegetable shortening
3 eggs
½ cup honey (buckwheat if available)

Cream all ingredients until smooth, about 10 minutes.
1¼ cups all purpose flour
½ tsp baking powder
½ tsp salt
½ tsp cinnamon
1/8 tsp cloves
¼ tsp nutmeg
1/8 tsp allspice
1 cup diced, candied pineapple
¾ cup golden raisins
½ cup toasted chopped walnuts
½ cup toasted slivered almonds

Mix all ingredients together along with the sliced prunes and apricots. Coat the fruit and nuts well. Add to the creamed mixture, mixing well. Pour into a 10" tube pan or 2 greased 9" x 5" loaf pans. Place a pan of water in the oven. Bake for 2 hours or until cake tester comes out clean. Cool. Remove from pans and wrap in aluminum foil to keep fresh.

Rosh Hashanah Next Week in The Canadian Jewish news

Taking stock of our diets

By RICHARD SCHWARTZ
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Rosh Hashanah is the time when we take stock of our lives and consider new beginnings.

Perhaps the most significant and meaningful change that Jews should consider this year is a shift away from diets that have been having devastating effects on human health and the health of our increasingly imperiled planet.

While many Jews seem to feel that the New Year celebration is enhanced by the consumption of chopped liver, gefilte fish, chicken soup and roast chicken, there are many inconsistencies between the values of Rosh Hashanah and the realities of flesh-centred diets:

While Jews ask God on Rosh Hashanah for a healthy year, they are often partaking of holiday meals that may have just the opposite result. Non-vegetarian diets have been linked to heart disease, strokes, several forms of cancer and other illnesses.

While we implore "our Father, our King" on Rosh Hashanah to "keep the plague from thy people," high fat, meat-based diets are causing a plague of degenerative diseases that have resulted in total U.S. medical costs soaring from $80 billion in 1970 to more than $1.1 trillion in 1994.

While Jews pray on the Jewish New Year that God "remove pestilence, sword and famine," over 70 per cent of the grain grown in the United States is fed to animals destined for slaughter, as 20 million people die annually because of hunger and its effect.

Flesh-centered diets, by wasting valuable resources, help to perpetuate the widespread hunger and poverty that often lead to instability and war.

While Jews commemorate the creation of the world on Rosh Hashanah, livestock farming contributes in a large way to many global threats, such as soil erosion and depletion, air and water pollution related to the production and use of pesticides and chemical fertilizer, and the destruction of tropical rain forests and other habitats.

While Rosh Hashanah is a time when we are to "awake from our slumber" and mend our ways, the consumption of meat on Rosh Hashanah means that we are continuing the habits that are so detrimental to our health, to animals, to hungry people and to ecosystems.

While we symbolically cast away our sins at Tashlich during Rosh Hashanah, eating meat means continuing the "sins" associated with our diets, with regard to treatment of animals, protecting our health, polluting the environment and wasting food and other resources.

While Rosh Hashanah is meant to be a time of deep contemplation when we carefully examine our deeds, most meat-eaters ignore the many moral issues related to their diets.

While we speak of God's "delighting in life" on Rosh Hashanah, the standard American diet annually involves the brutal treatment and deaths of billions of animals, as well as many human deaths due to insufficient food in poor countries and too much rich food in the wealthy countries.

While Rosh Hashanah has a universal message and involves the prayer that "all the world's people shall come to serve (God)," many of the world's people suffer from chronic hunger, which denies them the necessary strength and will for devotion, while meat and fish from the choicest land and most bountiful waters of their countries is exported to meet dietary demands in developed countries.

While Rosh Hashanah is a time of joy (along with sincere meditation), millions of people throughout the world are too involved in worrying where their next meal will come from to be able to experience many joyous moments.

leaves, wilted

Filling:

1 lb. ground 100 per cent white meat turkey breast
OR 1 lb. lean ground beef
1 leek or 1 cup onion, chopped
1 tsp. fresh ginger, peeled and chopped
1 8-ounce can water chestnuts, drained
1 tbsp. kosher dry sherry
1 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. (low-sodium) soy sauce

Sauce:

2 tbsp. (low-sodium) soy sauce
2 cups water
3 tbsp. kosher dry sherry

Drain the leaves from the water.

Place ground meat and leek in food processor. Process briefly. Then add ginger, water chestnuts, sherry, salt and soy sauce. Process again, just until blended. It's all right if the water chestnuts are chunky.

If you are using regular cabbage, line bottom of a large pot with torn cabbage leaves. Divide the filling into 15. Place a portion of filling in centre of cabbage leaf. Fold in the sides, then roll over to close. Repeat until all the leaves are filled.

If you are using Chinese cabbage, line bottom of a large bowl with some of the inside leaves that are too small to stuff. Divide filling into 24. Place a portion at the stem end of each leaf. Roll over twice. Fold the sides in over the filling, if possible. Then roll over to close.

Place the rolls in the prepared pot. Add the sauce. Bring to a boil, cover, and reduce the heat to simmer. Continue cooking until the cabbage is tender, about 1½ hours.

Makes 15 regular cabbage rolls, 24 Chinese cabbage rolls.

Häagen-Dazs is low-fat and kosher

Who would have thought that Häagen-Dazs and low-fat would ever be mentioned in the same breath? This summer, many dreams are coming true as Häagen-Dazs Yogourt Ices hits grocery shelves, offering the great taste Häagen-Dazs is renowned for, but with a fat content of less than two per cent.

And they are kosher, as well, under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR).

Häagen-Dazs' new Yogourt Ices feature super premium frozen yogourt with a twist — in the form of tangy swirls of fresh fruit ice made from all-natural fruit purée and fruit juice. Three refreshing flavors are available — Orange Tango, Raspberry Rendezvous and Strawberry Duet. A Decima Research survey commissioned by Ault Foods for the introduction of yogourt in Canada, found that strawberry (44 per cent), raspberry (39 pee cent) and orange (36 per cent) are by far the favorite fruit ice flavors of Canadians of all ages and backgrounds.

According to A. C. Neilsen, in 1993, Canadians spent $13.8 million on five million litres of frozen yogourt in grocery stores, compared to $272 million for 173.5 million litres of ice cream.

In addition to being less than two per cent fat, yogourt ices are kind to the waistline — with only 138 calories per 125 mL sering. Like all Häagen-Dazs products, yogourt ices are made with all-natural ingredients and contain no preservatives, artificial flavors, stabilizers, colorings or additives. Yogourt Ices also provide 10 per cent of the recommended daily intake of calcium.

The Ault/Decima survey also revealed that while 55 per cent of Canadians eat frozen yogourt regularly, a significant 37 per cent of the population would eat more frozen yogourt if it tasted more like their favorite ice cream.

According to the survey, consumers of frozen yogourt perceive themselves as health-conscious (71 per cent); active (42 per cent); sporty (34 per cent); and fashionable (30 per cent). They tend to associate themselves with physical activities such as aerobics, walking and tennis.

The survey revealed that the image of a "typical" frozen yogourt eater was more likely to be an athlete than other celebrities. Nancy Kerrigan, Myriam Bedard and Wayne Gretzky were more likely to be perceived as frozen yogourt eaters than other stars such as Tom Cruise, Celine Dion or Hilary Clinton.

The survey also revealed that Ontarians, especially those residing in major centres, consume more frozen yogourt than their fellow Canadians. They consider the frozen dessert a universal product with wide appeal. Sixty per cent of Ontario residents say they eat frozen yogourt because "it tastes good."

For your information, the experts at Häagen-Dazs explain the differences between frozen desserts:

Ices and sorbets are the same — it just depends what you prefer to call them. Typically, ices and sorbets are a mixture of frozen fruit puree, water and sugar.

Unlike ices or sorbets, sherbets contain some dairy products. The basic sherbet ingredients are fresh or dried skim milk and milk fat added to a base of syrup and fruit juice. Sherbets have a minimal amount of fat — typically less than two per cent.

Ice milk, as its name suggests is made from milk and contains added milk solids, sugar and flavoring. It is sometimes sold as soft serve ice cream and has approximately four per cent fat.

As the name implies, frozen yogourt is a frozen version of yogourt. The balance between frozen yogourt's ingredients can vary greatly from brand to brand and fat content therefore generally varies between two and five per cent.

Ice cream's basic ingredients are cream. whole and/or condensed milk, and/or other milk solids, sugar and flavoring. Regular ice cream contains 10 per cent fat while light ice cream is five to 10 per cent fat. Premium and super premium ice creams have between 14 and 18 per cent fat by weight.

Häagen-Dazs Yogourt Ices are available in supermarket chains and grocery stores across Canada.

Sweet cakes important part of Israel's past

Jerusalem Dateline

Archeologists and cultural anthropologists have devoted a great deal of effort to explaining precisely why sweet cakes have always enjoyed such vast popularity in Israel and in the neighboring nations of North Africa and Asia.

It is known, for example, that as much as 9,000 years ago, the people of ancient Jericho enjoyed making cakes by dipping unleavened bread into a mixture of honey and herbs.

Later the Pharaohs and citizens of ancient Egypt enjoyed cakes that were filled with dried fruits and spices. There is even evidence that in the city of Ur, located in ancient Sumeria, street vendors sold cakes to passersby and that these cakes were very similar to the modern-day Middle Eastern favorite known as baklava.

So important have cakes been to the everyday and religious life of the region that there are more than 1,700 references to them in the Bible and the Koran.

Many social scientists feel that two factors are primarily responsible for the phenomenon. The first is that bees, and therefore honey, have always been plentiful in the entire region bounded by the Nile and the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers. The second is that this was probably the part of the world where men and women discovered how to make and use ovens.

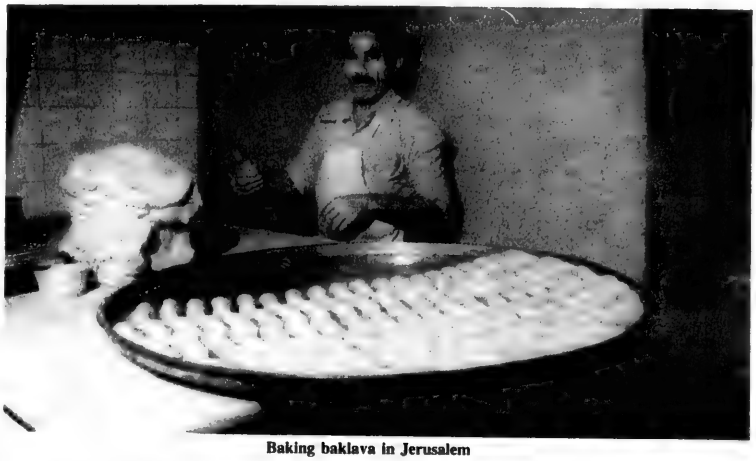
As popular as cakes have been, there is a good chance that no one who ever visited or lived in the Holy Land ever had a greater love of cakes than Queen Helena, the mother of Constantine, Emperor of Byzantia. In 326 CE, Helena visited the Holy Land, and for six to seven years lived in Jerusalem to supervise the construction of churches and chapels above sacred Christian sites. Among her projects were the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem and the basilica at Abraham's Oak near Hebron.

The queen was so enamored of cakes that wherever she travelled she always wore robes with especially large pockets, and those pockets were always filled with cakes and cookies.

Even more, whenever the queen was invited to dinner, a member of her staff would pay a call on her potential hosts a day or two before the meal, to inform the servants there precisely what kind of cakes should be prepared.

According to one of Helena's scribes, on one such occasion, "My lady touched not a morsel of the lamb or the quail or the fish that were served... nor did she partake of the the soups or the roasts or the root vegetables, choosing instead to save her energies for the sweets she had requested."

When it came to the cakes, the scribe continued, "The queen did not restrain herself and ate the entirety of two large cakes, a large cup of pomegranate seeds in sweet wine, a marvelous amount of sweet biscuits, three portions of flavored ice, and a large plate of berries in honeyed cheese."



Baking baklava in Jerusalem

Portraits of Helena may be seen today in many of the Greek and Armenian Orthodox churches of Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Nazareth. There is nothing surprising in the fact that she is always portrayed as smiling. What is amazing is that the Queen is invariably portrayed as thin.

Cakes, cookies and sweet biscuits have never gone out of fashion in Israel and many of those that were popular a thousand or more years ago are still in demand today. Then as now, for example, many of the most beloved cakes of the region are based on phylo dough, those large, rectangular paper thin strips of dough sometimes known as strudel pastry.

One of the differences is that because making phylo dough is a process that involves a great deal of mess in the kitchen, and many hours of work, few make it at home today. In Israel, as in nearly all the nations of the world, phylo dough is available either frozen in supermakets or fresh at the shops of professional bakers.

Baklava

- ½ lb. phylo dough leaves
- 2 cups pistachio nuts, chopped coarsely
- ½ cup almonds, chopped
- 2½ cups sugar
- 1 tsp. ground cinnamon
- 2 cups unsalted butter, melted
- ¾ cup honey

Juice of one large lemon

- 3 slices each orange and lemon rind
- 2 cinnamon sticks
- 4 whole cloves

Remove the phylo leaves from the refrigerator about 2 hours before use. In a mixing bowl combine the pistachio nuts, almonds, 6 tbsps. of the sugar and the ground cinnamon. Mix well.

In a lightly greased baking pan, about the size of the phylo leaves, place sheets of phylo, brushing every other sheet with the melted butter. On this, spread one third of the nut mixture and then lay on 6 more phylo sheets, buttering each. Distribute another third of the nut mixture on this and again cover with 6 phylo sheets, buttering each. On these distribute the final third of the nut mixture. Cover with 8-12 phylo sheets, buttering every other sheet. With a sharp, wet knife, cut the baklava into diamond-shaped pieces.

Heat the remaining butter until it begins to brown and pour over the baklava. Sprinkle the top with a few drops of water and place in an oven that has preheated to 180°C (350°F) for 30 minutes. Reduce the oven heat to 170°C (330°F) and bake for 1 hour longer.

In a large skillet combine the remaining sugar with the honey, lemon juice, fruit rinds, cinnamon sticks and cloves. Add 2 cups of water and then heat over a low flame, stirring constantly until a boil is obtained. Remove immediately from the heat. Allow to cool, remove the cinnamon sticks and cloves and then pour the liquids over the baklava when it is fully baked. Serve warm or at room temperature. (Yields 24-30 portions).

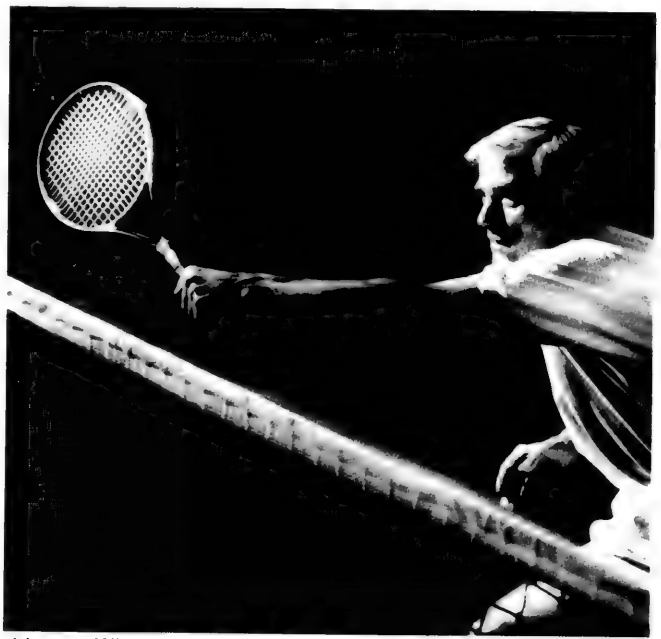
LifeStyle

At Mayfair Racquet & Fitness Clubs, the Future of Fitness is taking Shape



In September 1970, the first Mayfair Racquet Club opened its doors to racquet sports devotees in the Metropolitan Toronto area. At that time, the club was a modest facility with only four indoor tennis courts. What was different about Mayfair, even in its days as a pioneer sports and fitness club, was the vision: the determination to build the best year-round racquet facilities anywhere.

Through 24 years of commitment to quality in equipment, facilities and service, Mayfair has earned the right to be recognized as the leader in racquet sports clubs. There are now 42 indoor tennis courts, 33 squash courts, eight racquetball courts, four badminton courts, and personal instruction programs which are unparallelled anywhere. For those who want to play on a team, there are house leagues and tournaments.

Today, Mayfair is more than just the leader among racquet clubs. Over the years, it has extended its commitment, to offer the public a comprehensive program which encompasses all aspects of fitness.

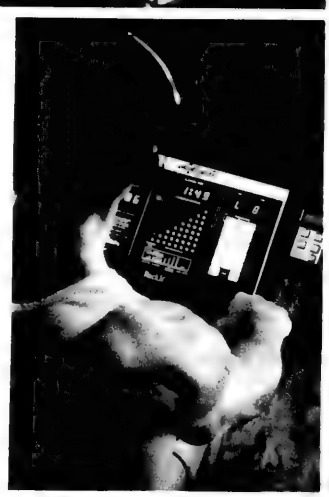
In August and September 1994, the doors will open onto the future of fitness. Mayfair will be offering you a new, comprehensive Fitness Expansion, with over 45,000 square feet of state-of-the-art exercise equipment, selectorized Resistance weight training, cardio-vascular training equipment stations for complete body conditioning, new aerobics studios, and complete fitness consultation services with certified instructors.

The new Fitness Expansions are opening on August 15 at Mayfair Parkway, with 17,000 square feet of new space; on September 1 at Mayfair West, with another 17,000 square feet; and finally, on September 15 at Mayfair East, with another 11,000 square feet. Only at Mayfair, the complete fitness facility, will you find everything under one roof. It truly is the one stop fitness and raquet club.

Among the special features Mayfair offers are the Cardio Theater, the ultimate synthesis of exercise and entertainment, which is not available at any other club. While you work out on the most up-to-date treadmills, step machines and exercise bicycles, you can enjoy your favorite shows or music. The personal control unit and headset on each cardio machine, which connects you to the Audio Visual Centre, allows you to choose from a selection of compact discs, AM or FM radio, TV and videos. When have you ever enjoyed working out this much?

Mayfair takes pride in offering you the most technologically advanced designs in exercise equipment. There are Star Trac and Trotter treadmills, Concept II rowing machines and Nordic Track XC skiing machines; there are Tectric Bikemax and Lifecycle exercise bicycles, as well as Climbmax, Stairmaster and Lifestep machines.

Mayfair's objective is to help you reach the fitness goals you choose. With the MicroFit (TM) computerized evaluation system, a staff of certified professional trainers will assess your fitness level and design a program to suit your condition and needs. With Mayfair's personal trainers available to offer you ongoing, one-on-one guidance in achieving your goals, you will not only get fit: you will stay that way.



Aerobic training, which includes the step and the slide, may be either high or low intensity. There are certified instructors, convenient class times for people with busy schedules, and new, expanded air-conditioned studios with cushioned floors and surround sound for your comfort and relaxation.

This new, expanded fitness experience comes at no extra cost. It will be included in your monthly membership fee of only $52. There is no extra charge for MicroFit (TM) personal assessments, cardio and resistance training equipment, or aerobics. Also, the hourly tennis court rates of $8 and $20 remain unchanged, except for one time slot: Saturday and Sunday evenings after 5:30 p.m., which are being reduced from $20 to $14.

If you are already a member of Mayfair Racquet & Fitness Clubs, you will continue to enjoy reciprocal privileges at all three Mayfair uptown clubs. If you are not yet a member, and register in August, you will save $450 on the initiation fee of $600; if you register in September, you will save $300. Exercise your right to join the future of fitness today.

Each club is conveniently located close to major travel routes. Mayfair Parkway is at 50 Steelcase Rd. East on the northeast corner of Woodbine Ave., in Markham; telephone (905) 475-0350. Mayfair East is located at 160 Esna Park Drive on the northeast corner of Denison St., also in Markham; phone (905) 475-8833. Mayfair West is at 3855 Chesswood Drive and Sheppard Ave. West, on the northwest corner, in Downsview; phone (416) 638-1010. If a downtown location is more convenient for you, Mayfair Lakeshore is at 801 Lake Shore Blvd. East in Toronto; phone (416) 466-3777.

Margo's Custom Hats make you whoever you want to be Style. Dignity. Elegance. Flair. Drama. Mystery. These are just some of the qualities the right hat can give you, and Margo's Custom Hats has built an enviable reputation for creating the looks that women are looking for.

Thirty-three years at the same location speaks volumes about the kind of quality and service offered at Margo's. Before buying the business five years ago, present owner Effie Xynnis-Hall (also known as Margo) apprenticed under former owner Lillian Fletcher because it was "the only place in Canada" where she could learn the finer points of hat-making.

With an extensive background in fashion and costume design (some of it with the National Ballet of Canada), Effie found the world of hats provided a natural outlet for her creative talents. Those talents are now in demand by the entertainment industry; Effie is often asked to create elaborate hats for theatrical and motion picture productions. On a more down-to-earth note, she also designs headware for women suffering from cancer to help them maintain their dignity and elegance during this difficult period.

Surprisingly, Margo's custom work is often less expensive than ready-made hats sold elsewhere. For example, Margo's custom-made bridal veils (noted for their fullness) start at only $69. Her ready-to-wear prices are equally reasonable: winter hats range from $40 to $170, summer hats from $12 to $170. And the selection is endless; you'll find hats in every conceivable fabric and style. Bring in your own fabric (wool, leather, fur, almost anything except the skins of protected species, which Effie won't touch), and she'll custom-make a hat in the style of your choice. If you have a picture of a hat that captures your fancy, Effie can create your hat from the picture.

Weddings, bar mitzvahs, bat mitzvahs, and the high holidays provide much of Margo's business. Bridal headpieces are a specialty, and anything from the simple to the ornate can be designed to match your wedding dress.

Buying a hat at Margo's means receiving the kind of expert service and advice you won't get in a department store. The hat needs to compliment the shape of your face, your bone structure, and other features; if it doesn't, Effie will tell you and advise an alternative. The hat needs to fit perfectly; if it doesn't, Effie will alter it as needed. You can bring in your old hats for expert repair or retrimming, and she'll advise you whether it's worthwhile to do so.

Most of the styles Margo's sells are of the classic and enduring variety, but trend-setting styles are always available. Cloches are big for fall, as are faux furs and the 'twenties look. For any occasion, Margo's will outfit you with a hat that brings out the best in you and your dress or suit.

Attitude, we're told, can make or break us. A positive, upbeat attitude can make our day.

According to Rhonda Flomen, owner of Rhonda Maternity wear, a woman's attitude during pregnancy may be the single most important factor in how she dresses. Many women consider shopping for maternity wear a chore, when in fact they should be taking precisely the opposite approach. "You're having a baby. The bulge in your midsection signifies the arrival of a new life and should be celebrated, not lamented. If you look good, you feel good, and this adage applies even more during pregnancy – not less." The tendency to wear whatever you can get away with during pregnancy is particularly counter-productive, says Flomen, and only reinforces the negative associations.

With twenty-four years at 110 Cumberland behind her (plus seven years in Thornhill and five in Mississauga), Flomen has obviously communicated this message quite nicely to two generations of mothers. The remedy for success, of course, is built on more than just attitude: quality clothing with an emphasis on natural fibres (pure cotton, linen, and wool) is a Rhonda keynote. The shop carries a wonderful variety of outfits for every occasion in sizes 6 to 16, and most of them are Rhonda's own private label, ensuring her clients exclusivity at a lower price than they'd pay elsewhere for similar quality.

Starting with casual, buying a T-shirt at Rhonda's doesn't mean dressing down; she has some lovely styled fashion T's now at $49 (reg. $69). Slip into some cotton casual pants and cotton/lycra leggings and you'll have an outfit. Moving into career wear, there are print and solid dresses (from $129) in cotton and wool, and beautifully structured wool suits. Wool blazers start at $199. In cocktail and evening wear, there's a striking selection of dresses in pure silk. Style-wise, long skirts and jumpers are strong, as are knit coordinates. "All the natural colours" are big now, says Rhonda, especially black, taupe, and green. Burgundy is also prominent.

Rhonda recommends you shop for maternity wear in your fourth month of pregnancy. "At that point whatever you buy will carry you through to the term of your pregnancy," she says.

Her obsession with quality has been a mixed blessing, she jokes. Her merchandise lasts so well that a single outfit often carries a customer through several years (and pregnancies). And, because you've purchased a quality fashion garment, once the pregnancy is over your maternity outfits can take their rightful place in your regular wardrobe.

In short: look good, feel good, and put a smile on your face for your child-to-be. He or she will want to hear how much you enjoyed the experience.

Feet respond to Mephisto music

"If the shoe fits, wear it." Mephisto takes this old adage one step further by offering a range of shoes so form-fitting and comfortable that their proponents (many of them world-famous celebrities) insist on wearing them everywhere, even in the unlikeliest of places. At a board meeting – at a ribbon-cutting ceremony – like a "little rascal", this lovable shoe keeps turning up everywhere it shouldn't, with no apologies from the wearers. As for the feet that are "clothed" in them, listen closely and you can almost hear them breathe a sigh of relief. Walk a few steps in them, and you may find it impossible to don another pair of shoes again.

Most shoe manufacturers design their shoes in isolation of the foot, then hope that enough feet can be shoehorned into them to make the cash register ring. Mephisto (under still-active founder Martin Michaeli) has taken the opposite approach by analyzing the physiological needs of the human foot and then developing a shoe to meet those needs. Thirty years after the first pair were fashioned in Alsace, France, they're still made by hand; no fewer than 98 different artisans are involved in the fabrication of each pair of all-natural, all-resoleable shoes. You'll pay a little more for a pair of Mephistos, but you'll get a shoe (or boot, or sandal) that will redefine your idea of comfort.

This is especially true if you have back problems or any foot-related disorders. Mephistos are designed with a myriad of features that can correct or alleviate almost any such deficiency, making them an ideal walking shoe. Indeed, they've helped many people "rediscover" walking as a form of exercise and recreation.

Even though many famous people wear the shoes, Mephisto avoids the celebrity endorsement route taken by many athletic shoe companies. Their market penetration has been so rapid, so "underground" in nature, that they have acquired a cult following of sorts. And Mephisto serves their followers well: according to Canadian director Ralph Benisty, they "need to spend a minimum of 20 minutes with each customer to explain all the comfort features and value they're getting with each shoe."

Benisty points to a fourfold increase in sales over the past year as evidence of the shoe's popularity. The Mephisto line includes a wide variety of walking shoes as well as sandals and boots. It's available at two Mephisto boutiques downtown and at better shoe stores nationwide.

You won't find Michael Jordan advertising them, but you will find Margaret Thatcher wearing them – as well as Professor Barnard, Luciano Pavarotti, Queen Sofia of Spain, and other notables. But you don't have to run a country or conduct an orchestra to wear Mephistos; you just have to love your feet. If they don't love you back, maybe it's time to get the relationship back on the right foot.

"The New Très Cher" an old favourite for up-to-the-minute children's fashions

If you've ever had children – or if you're going to have them – chances are you've heard of Très Cher (French for "very dear"). If you haven't, you're probably "très new" in town; this store, a Toronto landmark, has been the shopping destination of Toronto mothers for generations.

Stretching a full half-block with its five windows and five awnings, Très Cher has every imaginable outfit for boys and girls aged zero to sixteen years. Casual wear, dressy wear, outerwear, it's all here in a range of sizes and selection unmatched by almost any children's wear store anywhere. Couple this with a full-time staff of six that offers a level of service and expertise far above the norm, and it's easy to see why Très Cher is a perennial favourite.

Owners Gerry and Myrna Cohen have a forty-year history in the children's wear business. They opened Togs & Toys in Lawrence Plaza in 1953 and were married three months later. (Prospective store owners/newlyweds take note). They parlayed this store into a six-store chain with a flagship store in Yorkdale. Twenty-seven hectic years later, they "downscaled" to Très Cher, whose already enviable reputation they have maintained and enhanced. In recognition of their efforts, the Cohens recently received the 1994 CAMA Lifetime Achievement Award for Excellence in Retailing.

"The New Très Cher" has 4,400 square feet of fashion and features five separate yet interlocked stores, all accessible from the same entrance. There's a boys' 2-16 shop, an infants' boutique, a girls' 2-6x store, a girls' 7 to teen store and an outerwear store. In addition, the store custom makes special occasion wear under their own label.

For back to school and the high holidays, you'll find all the quality name-brand merchandise you've come to expect. This fall your outerwear needs will be addressed as never before: Très Cher promises "aggressive pricing" on a number of popular outerwear lines.

For weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, and other special occasions, a visit to Très Cher is "de rigueur" (French for "a must"). Many bat mitzvahs could easily be mistaken for a Très Cher fashion show.

The Cohens have clothed three generations and are working on their fourth.

What do 2 Guys – One from San Diego, One from Toronto's Fashion Industry – know about Renovation?

Plenty! They know where to get Toronto's BEST VALUES in renovation supplies AND how to put it all together to create renovations that give a truly different feel to a home or office.

Toronto's Best Deals!

2 1/2" Colonial baseboard at ONLY 39 cents a linear foot. Ask for Harry (the owner) at RIO LUMBER, No Rain, Ivan, Mike or David. Everyone there is extremely knowledgeable – Harry's been there for 50 years! If you want the BEST PRICES on cedar and all your building supplies. THIS is the place to go. Remember, Rain or No Rain!

Magnificent 12"x12" pure white Negev tiles at $1.29 sq. ft. This Israeli company's slogan is "from the sands that Moses walked on, ceramics to the world." For terrific ceramic tiles, specials on inexpensive bathroom fixtures, and drywall, KINGSTON PLUMBING's the best! See Rubin, Sammy or Simon. This is a true family business but on Thursday, Sammy is off so his mother is in and this means BAGELS AND CREAM CHEESE. If Sammy isn't in, you can be sure his father Rubin is, and Simon's minding the cash. Also check out their prices – where else can you find a toilet for $69 or toilet, vanity and tub for only $279?

The "Winners" of designer bathroom fixtures. Great prices on jacuzzis, toilets and vanities. Choose from brand names such as Kohler or American Standard. For end-of-line toilets and sinks at fantastically low prices, check out PLUMBING WAREHOUSE! If Andre doesn't have it, he'll get it in for you. Dianne will look after all your questions. She's always very helpful ...she may even tell you to use Kirsch Construction and Project Management.

While you're there, check out $40/gal Pratt & Lambert's Vitro White paint and discover the whitest of all whites.

One Final Tip

Use KIRSCH CONSTRUCTION AND PROJECT MANAGEMENT to put it all together. They're UNIQUE in their approach to renovation.

Steven Kirsch has spent most of his adult life as an owner/builder and understands the hassles and problems associated with remodeling. Kirsch grew up in Toronto and honed his renovation sense renovating houses along the Pacific coast. There he learned how to bring light and warmth into dark spaces and how to use a wide range of different materials to give a rich effect.

Mark Cowan comes from Toronto's fashion industry, and he brings a superb eye for colour, texture and fabric to create a warm, rich interior. Together they bring a DIFFERENT EYE to renovation and project management.

They also know from firsthand experience that owners hate the DUST connected with renovating. So they have perfected their own FILTER to minimize the spreading of particles. They tailor WORK HOURS to suit each family's needs. Through careful administration they get projects completed ...on time ...on budget.

Raisins, Almonds and More Under New Management

Roni and Elana Kalef have operated Raisins, Almonds and More since April, 1994. As Roni is an architect, Elana a designer, they each bring to this business their own special talent. Along with many new kosher products, the store has a new personality, clean and neat, with fragrant herbs and spices on the shelves adding to the pleasant atmosphere.

The previous owners had a gift basket and tray department, which the Kalefs have enlarged. Elana has put her knowledge and talent into gift baskets, made to order for each individual. She uses only fresh quality products sold in the store, and can be generous with quantity because she buys in bulk. She also makes baskets for hospital patients and people on special diets. If something smaller is more appropriate, there are gift birds which can be filled with nuts and candies; these cost from $5 up.

A gift basket is a perfect way to wish mazel tov or shabbat shalom; an ideal present for birth or birthday, office opening, moving into a new home, or coming home from hospital. Raisins, Almonds and More has many clients in Baycrest hospital and the seniors' home. Elana also sends baskets to Montreal, Ottawa, Israel and the U.S.

Raisins, Almonds and More has a large bulk and dry foods department, with beans, grains, raisins, dried fruits, candies, chocolates and nuts. All the nuts are dry-roasted (without oil) in a roastery under COR supervision.

People with special diet needs will find vegetarian burgers, schnitzel cutlets, nuggets, hot dogs, cold cuts, and deli slices from Israel, all kosher; sugar-free products, including a line of diabetic candies, chocolates, jello, pudding and icing; lactose-free products like pareve tofu cheesecake; wheat-free, salt-free, and fat-free products; and many other natural foods.

Also, there are ethnic foods like malawah a Yemenite dish, a type of dough that you fry lightly until it fluffs up; then you put in filling, fold the dough over, and you have a whole meal. Finally, just for fun, there are snacks like chocolate yogurt, and gourmet and Israeli candies.

Raisins, Almonds and More is across from Baycrest, at 3501 Bathurst on the east side. Baskets may be ordered in person, by phone (782-2528), or fax (782-4395).

House of Seasons for Personal Service

The House of Seasons is a unique ladies' boutique tucked away in Huntingwood Square in Scarborough.

Owner Marlene Huggett takes special pride in offering personal service, and believes ladies need to feel good about how they look. "We do not try to make them into something they are not," she says. "We treat ladies the way we ourselves like to be treated when we shop."

Here you will find one-of-a-kind accessories by Canadian artisans, who co-ordinate earrings, necklaces, brooches and belts with House of Seasons clothing; beautiful hand-painted silk scarves and cowls to accent your wardrobe; and the wonderful look of Barbara's elegant hand-painted blouses and skirts. "We dress our ladies completely," says Marlene. "We suggest mix-and-match ideas to extend an existing wardrobe, or to give a new outfit different looks."

To meet your individual needs, the House of Seasons keeps records of what you purchase and like, and what styles fit you. Personal fashion consultation and home wardrobe evaluation are available. Each season, the House newsletter informs you about the latest in fashions and their promotion days.

The House of Seasons is expanding its market to include special fittings. As we mature, our bodies change; arthritis can affect the figure, and medical accessories are more common. After coming through bypass surgery with her own mother, Marlene knows how sensitive ladies can be about such changes.

House of Seasons staff are knowledgeable, caring and attentive to these needs. The staff makes appointments to fit your schedule, and home visits for special needs. There is home shopping for shut-ins, and transportation if needed.

Over the past few years, people have come to want better value and service for their money. House of Seasons owes its continued success to personal service; a satisfied customer refers friends, relatives or colleagues.

House of Seasons buys quality, up-to-date Canadian fashions. Marlene works closely with their Canadian designer, Bardocz Classics by Wilma B, whose regular line ranges in size from 4 to 24; her designs are available only in exclusive boutiques. Monthly promotion days feature her each season.

Since opening eight years ago, the House of Seasons has carried up-to-date fashions by Mister Leonard, Gary Petites and Lauren Jeffries. Other popular Canadian manufacturers include London Fog sportswear, Fashion Gallery parachute cloth designs, French Fact dresses, Parkhurst sweaters, Paris Star, Moda Petite, Elite blouses and Gemini outerwear.

House of Seasons is at 2582 Birchmount Road, in Huntingwood Square in Scarborough; telephone (416) 297-4114.

LifeStyle

The lighter side of holiday recipes - for the way we live

During the Jewish holidays, we eat traditional foods that are filled with symbolic and spiritual significance. On Rosh Hashanah, for example, a round-shaped challah is served to symbolize the continuity of life. We also dip apples in honey in the hope of a sweet new year.

The foods that we prepare during the holidays have become as important to us as all other time-honoured traditions, especially if the recipes that we use have been passed down from generation to generation. But as times change, so do our tastes and lifestyles, including the way in which we eat and prepare our meals. Gone are the days of fat-laden soups, heavy cream sauces and rich desserts. While our mothers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers cooked with the best of intentions, our generation's more health-conscious, lower-fat eating habits have inspired us to put our own mark on these recipes that we cherish.

There are many ways to introduce a healthier approach to holiday cooking - without compromising flavour. Here are some helpful tips:

- Choose recipes that require baking, broiling or steaming, instead of frying.
- If you prefer the taste of fried foods, lightly brush the surface with Fleischmann's® SALT FREE margarine, then bake it to get the same flavour.
- If you must fry, prepare the food in advance, freeze, then bake to defrost which will allow the oil to drip off.
- Try substituting Fleischmann's SALT FREE margarine in recipes that call for butter, oil or chicken fat. This will reduce the sodium, the saturated fat, and the cholesterol levels in your cooking.

Remember to use Fleischmann's when preparing all of your favourite dishes during the holidays and throughout the year. In addition to being KOSHER, Fleischmann's SALT FREE is the only national margarine brand that has a PAREVE designation.

Here are three traditional recipes - all with a lighter touch for the way we live today, and made with Fleischmann's SALT FREE margarine, which is KOSHER, PAREVE and a perfect choice when preparing your favourite holiday dishes.

VEAL SHOULDER ROAST

5 lbs	boneless veal shoulder-rolled & tied	2.5 kg
1	envelope dry onion soup mix	1
	paprika garlic powder, pepper to taste
3 tbsp	Fleischmann's® SALT FREE margarine	45 mL
1	large spanish onion - sliced	1
3	cloves fresh garlic - minced	3
1-2 cups	water	250-500 mL

- Rub veal with margarine and mixed dry ingredients.
- Place veal in baking pan, adding fresh garlic and onions on top and bottom of roast.
- Add water, cover, and stew slowly until fork tender at 350°F (180°C) for approximately 2 1/2 hours.
- Remove roast from gravy, and put gravy aside in separate dish.
- Let cool. Keep roast and gravy in refrigerator overnight.
- To reheat, slice veal, and put back into gravy which can be thickened with 2 tbsp. of cornstarch if desired.
- Reheat at 350°F (180°C) for 1/2 hour.

BUBIE HARRIET'S UPSIDE-DOWN NOODLE PUDDING

3/4 cup	brown sugar	175 mL
1/4 cup	corn syrup	60 mL
1/4 cup	Fleischmann's® SALT FREE margarine	60 mL
6 oz	egg noodles, medium width	170 g
4	eggs separated and beaten	4
1 tsp	salt	2 mL
1	dash of cinnamon	1
20	dried apricots and prunes (pitted)	20

- Soak apricots and prunes in hot water for 1 hour to soften.
- Mix 1/2 cup (125 mL) brown sugar, corn syrup and margarine and melt mixture in 9" square pyrex (2.5 L) baking dish in oven at 350°F (180°C) for approximately 5-10 minutes.
- Place fruit on bottom of pan in melted mixture; arrange fruit alternately and cut side up.
- Cook noodles in boiling water, lightly salted. Drain.
- In the meantime, mix beaten egg yolks, 1/4 cup (60 mL) brown sugar, salt and cinnamon. Beat egg whites to soft peaks and fold into mixture
- Mix egg mixture with noodles and pour over fruit in pan.
- Bake at 350°F (180°C) for one hour until sides are crisp.
- When baked, run knife along edges of pan and invert onto platter.
- Cut into squares and serve.
- Freezes well.

EASY APPLE DESSERT

8	Spy apples, peeled and cut into eighths	8
	brown sugar cinnamon
3/4 cup	granulated sugar	175 mL
1 cup	all purpose flour	250 mL
2 tsps	baking powder	10 mL
1/4 cup	Fleischmann's® SALT FREE margarine	60 mL
1	egg	1
	orange juice

- Preheat oven to 350°F (180°C).
- Grease a 2 quart (2.5 L) rectangular ovenproof baking dish with margarine.
- Sprinkle with brown sugar.
- Layer apples in dish and sprinkle them with cinnamon.
- In a mixing bowl, sift together the sugar, flour and baking powder.
- Cut in margarine.
- Break an egg into a measuring cup.
- Add enough orange juice to make 1/2 cup (125 mL) liquid.
- Add to flour mixture and beat with a wooden spoon until blended.
- Spoon mixture over apples.
- Bake 3/4 hour.
- Serve warm.

A Happy and Healthy New Year

Get Your New Year Off To A Healthy Start.

At Fleischmann's, we want to help you start your new year right. With a new look at the way we're living today.

We believe that life is meant to be enjoyed. It's about celebrating holidays with family and friends. And it's about taking good care of your own health and well-being.

We've taken a new look at the way we're living in the 90's. And we invite you to share in our new approach - it's about living for today.

COR 47

PAREVE

Living For Today. Eating For Tomorrow.

Living for today means living 'smart' so we can also enjoy our tomorrows. This includes making wise choices about the foods we eat to help us achieve an overall sense of vitality.

Fleischmann's® SALT FREE Margarine. It's PAREVE!

Fleischmann's SALT FREE margarine is the only national brand that is Pareve, Kosher and lactose-free. It's available in the 1 lb. twin sleeve and now in the 2 lb. tub as well.

Like Fleischmann's entire line-up of reformulated, non-hydrogenated margarines, Fleischmann's SALT FREE is cholesterol-free. It's a great choice for quality, for good taste and for the way we want to live today.

Poultry King for chickens raised in good health

Today, we not only want to eat the right food; we also want it to be raised right. Common sense tells us a healthy plant or animal makes us healthier.

Poultry King's chickens, turkeys and ducks are raised to be healthy. Owner Arnold Shlass buys his grain-fed, free-range style poultry from a farmer in Bradford who also grows their own feed. Being only 15 minutes from Bradford, Shlass can resupply easily, and always has fresh stock. Dealing direct with the farmer also lets him keep prices reasonable while maintaining quality.

Not only are Poultry King's fowl raised right? Conventional white chickens are processed in hot water, opening the pores to remove the feathers more easily; but this waterlogs the chicken, removes the outer layer of yellow skin, and harms the flavor. Poultry King's yellow chickens, on the other hand, are plucked and cleaned in cooler water, opening the pores enough to remove the feathers, but leaving skin and flavor intact. This is how mother and grandmother prepared chicken. Poultry King's methods unite tradition, science and common sense.

The other major part of Poultry King's business is smoking. While many processors use steam convection ovens, then spray the fowl with liquid smoke, Shlass uses a 60-year-old smoking oven in which he burns apple, cherry and beechwood. The wood is chopped to fine sawdust to burn slowly at 165 degrees Fahrenheit. At this low temperature, the smoke flavors the bird through and through, and preserves it naturally.

Poultry King sells to better restaurants like Centro on Yonge St., and has been doing contract work smoking fish, cheese, vegetables, even bones for chicken soup. Shlass also makes pure turkey salami, chicken kelbossa, and a cholesterol- and fat-free smoked breast roll recommended by nutrition and diet centers.

Newcomers find the quality astounding. Regular customers come from as far away as Forest Hill. Poultry King offers service as well, and will barbecue your chicken or custom cut or bone your fowl for you.

Shlass' mother, who used to make most of the prepared foods for United Bakers, now supplies Poultry King with traditional soups, knishes, kugel, noodle puddings, potato salad, chicken loaf, coleslaw and other delicacies.

Poultry King is at 10620 Yonge St., north of Major Mackenzie Drive in Richmond Hill.

The Baron Strikes Gold ... Again

"Good as Gold." Baron Herzog's California wines are enjoying a banner year as the line's top varietals continue to earn numerous medals at national and international competitions.

Baron Herzog Sauvignon Blanc 1991 and Herzog Late Harvest Johannesburg Riesling 1991 won gold medals at the World Wine Championships, the largest wine competition in the world. The Riesling also earned silver medals at several national competitions including the Los Angeles County Fair and the Atlanta Wine Summit.

Other top varietals include Baron Herzog Chenin Blanc 1992, gold medal winner at the San Diego National Wine Competition and Baron Herzog White Zinfandel 1991, honoured with numerous medals from the Taster's Guild International, Reno Wine Competition and Atlanta International Food and Wine Festival.

"Baron Herzog's achievements at these high-level competitions proves once again how consumers and wine connoisseurs are recognizing the superior quality and taste of Baron Herzog wines," said Jay Buchsbaum, the company's vice-president of marketing. "We foresee continued dynamic growth for the Baron Herzog line."

Baron Herzog wines have been repeatedly honoured at national and international wine competitions. This is the flagship brand of the Royal Wine Corporation's growing line of varietals.

Mazel Wines has for almost 37 years brought you the famous Kedem and Baron Herzog selections of premium quality wines. We will be pleased to conduct wine tasting events for any organizational functions. For further details please contact us at 631-8071.

Artalog Art Services: Gallery on a Disc

Artalog offers a complete range of art services to interior decorators, home and corporate buyers, collectors and artists. We offer appraisals and restoration; professional in-home and corporate art consulting; insurance documentation; gallery exhibitions and theme shows; and custom framing along with gifts and accessories.

If you are buying art for your home or office, or if you are a collector, have a look at Artalog's wide variety of works, beautifully displayed on large full-color monitors. Artalog assists you in selling your art through our exclusive art listing service. We make your art available to a market of potential purchasers without the art ever leaving your possession (until a qualified purchaser is found.) If you are in the market to buy art, then just tell us your criteria: subject, style, nationality, favorite colours, medium or price range and let us help you access art from our computer. Within seconds, you are viewing your selection.

Do you want to impart a new look to your home or office, but never find the hours to search from Gallery to Gallery? With a few strokes of the key, we do the searching, and leave the enjoyment to you. All you have to do is look over the selection, and choose the art, and make arrangements to return to see the actual artwork. Artalog is a Gallery on a Disc.

If you are an artist, can Artalog promote your work? Yes! We assist you through our listing service. Without ever being packed or shipped away from home or studio, your work becomes available to a market of potential buyers. For a nominal fee, we w feature your art on our Computer and Photo Compact Disc Systems, and offer it for sale to art consultants, interior designers, individual or corporate purchasers, and collectors. We can make arrangements to have our clients view your artwork either in Artalog or in a gallery or artist's studio.

If you are a decorator, Artalog is the smart, new way to find original works of Canadian and international art that match your designs. Artalog is located inside the Elte Carpets and Home Showroom, a magnet for interior decorators and designers. Artalog's wide variety of works, beautifully displayed on large full-colour monitors show an ever changing selection of original graphics, oils, acrylics, watercolours.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

The Lure and Lore of Petra: The recent opening of the Avara border crossing between Eilat, Israel, and Aqaba, Jordan, will likely lead to a dramatic increase in the number of foreign visitors to Petra, the famed ancient city that was lost to the West for many centuries. It's possible to see Petra in as little as a few hours, but archeologically-minded tourists might prefer several days to explore the vast site at leisure. If so, planning and advance reservations are required. Hotels would proliferate here but for the short supply of water. The only major hotel in the vicinity, the 80-room Petra Forum Hotel, often fills up weeks and months in advance, and would-be guests are frequently turned away.

Swiss explorer John Lewis Burckhardt "discovered" Petra while travelling through the region in 1812. He evidently told the suspicious local Bedouin that he wanted to sacrifice a lamb at the alleged tomb of the biblical Aaron, on nearby Mount Hor. In those days, and well into this century, the journeying was perilous for Europeans in the region. Despite his ruse, Burckhardt was threatened with a firearm.

Renowned traveller

As the renowned orientalist-traveller Charles M. Doughty wrote in 1888, many travellers "commonly lament the robber violence" of the villagers. Henry Layard, discoverer of Nineveh and one of the founding fathers of modern archaeology, was robbed by the locals when he visited Petra in 1840.

Apparently, the site was thought to contain vast treasure hordes of gold and silver, and it is on account of this misinformation that the first building one sees, at the end of the deep and narrow canyon known as the Siq, is called El Khaznah Faroun, or the Treasury of the Pharoahs, although it was never meant as a treasury. This most impressive of all Petra's monuments is actually a grand two-story facade carved into the rock, topped by pediments and a kiosk with an urn in the centre. In decades past, many visitors have shot at the ornament with rifles, foolishly hoping to dislodge the rumored stockpiles of gold.

This Treasury building is deceivingly large. Standing as far back as the topography permitted, I found that the wide-angle lens of my camera still would not permit me to photograph both levels of the structure in one shot.

Another obstruction was presented by a Bedouin who was reposing upon his squatting camel, parked roughly midway between myself and the monument. Evidently, he would not tolerate his image being captured on film without adequate compensation.

G. Lankester Harding, author of the excellent Antiquities of Jordan (1959), first visited Petra in 1932. He drove there from Gaza via Jerusalem and Amman, recording that "except for a brief stretch near Jerusalem, there was not a yard of surfaced road the whole way." He notes that only since about 1925 has it been possible to visit Petra without encountering unfriendly locals, and that the first members of the Arab Legion Police Post stationed there were massacred by the bloodthirsty local elements.

Work in progress

"Yet," he adds, "in 1956 Miss Diana Kirkbride ... was able to spend six months there on her own in charge of excavations, with no more trouble than an occasional row from someone who thought he ought to be employed on the work and wanted to know why he wasn't."

Owing to the enormity of the site, that work is still in progress today, and may very well be still in progress a century hence. An ancient people called the Nabateans carved thousands of tombs and dwelling-places into the rock at Petra, a Roman name which itself means "rock" — Roman, because that tribe conquered the stronghold in 106 CE, after which it became the hub of a Roman province, Arabia Petrae.

In time the Roman Empire fell, and after the rise of Islam in the seventh century, Petra sank into obscurity, remaining in this more or less tranquil seclusion through the building of a Crusade castle there in the 12th century, until the 19th century, when Burckhardt, disguised as an Arab, reached the lost city.

Considered one of the most accomplished orientalists of his century, the Swiss-born explorer is also remembered for discovering the Pharaonic monuments at Abir Simbul, along the upper reaches of the Nile. It is a sad truth that when he died he had not even begun the expedition for which all his years of study and travel in the East had been mere preparation.

His final expedition had been funded by the Africa Association of England, which wanted him to penetrate the dark continent, determine the proper course of the Niger River and find the remote and legendary city of Timbuktoo. Before any of this could be accomplished, however, Burkhardt died of dysentery in Cairo in 1816, at the age of 33.

Munich is a study in contrasts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

MUNICH, Germany — Visiting Munich in the 1930s, Tom Wolfe, the illustrious American novelist, gushed: "How can one speak of Munich but to say that it is a kind of German heaven?"

Munich, in fact, is beautiful. But its ugly Nazi past can — and occasionally does — intrude on its earthly pleasures.

With a population of 1.3 million, Munich is a sophisticated, cosmopolitan town, with more sights than a visitor can possibly absorb in one intensive day of touring.

Marienplatz, the heart and soul of old Munich, is best known for the Gothic-style Rathaus, or city hall, which is invariably crowded with tourists.

They all come to see the Glockenspiel on the ornate facade of the Rathaus. Each day at 11 a.m., noon and 5 p.m. during summer, enameled mechanical figures perform a kind of ritualized dance on the carillon, stiffly moving in and out of archways. Audiences love it.

Since the area around Marienplatz is full of cafes, restaurants, pubs and shops, you can happily spend an entire day here.

The Viktualienmarkt, the fabulous open air market, is minutes away from Marienplatz. Here you can browse to your heart's content, sampling excellent sour pickles and Weisswurst, or downing a refreshing glass of beer in the shady beergarden. Minutes away by foot is the finest gourmet food store in all of Munich, Alois Dallmyr, a veritable feast for the eyes.

Arguably, the most interesting neighborhood to be found in Munich is Schwabing, the local equivalent of New York's Greenwich Village.

Starting out as a sleepy village, it was transformed into an artists' quarter in the early part of this century, rendered famous by the likes of Kandinsky and Klee.

People in the know, though, claim that Schwabing's bohemian heyday ended in the 1960s. But to a Canadian visitor, Schwabing, with its cafe society along Leopoldstrasse, remains vital and stimulating.

Close by is Rachel Salamander's bookshop, Literatur Handlung, on 17 Furstenstrasse. It's the only Jewish bookshop in Munich, carrying more than 1,000 titles in a variety of languages, including English and Yiddish.

Bordering Schwabing is the Englischer Garten, a lovely 374-hectares park full of tranquil byways. Head for the Chinese Tower, with its 400-seat beergarden and canopy of mature chestnut trees.

Munich has many museums, but the finest is probably the Alte Pinakothek, with its collection of Old Masters. Unfortunately, it's currently closed for renovations.

Schloss Nymphenburg, the lavish summer residence of the Bavarian monarchy, is not to be missed. Forming one of the most outstanding palace complexes-cum-gardens in Europe, it's an architectural gem.

Look for the Gallery of Beauties, a collection of portraits of Bavaria's loveliest women, including Nanette Kaula, the daughter of court Jews; the Hall of Mirrors; the Marstall Museum, with its splendid assemblage of incredibly fancy coaches, carriages and sleds; and the pink-and-white rococo Amalienburg hunting lodge.

Jewish visitors should leave time for the Olympia Park, scene of the 1972 summer Olympic Games. A memorial to the 11 Israeli athletes who were murdered by Arab terrorists stands in front of their apartment at 31 Connolystrasse.

At Ludwig-Maximilian University, two squares are named after three of the leading members of the anti-Nazi White Rose resistance movement — Kurt Huber, Sophie Scholl and her brother, Hans, who were executed in 1943. A plaque in the main lobby is dedicated to all the White Rose martyrs.

FOCUS ON PERSONAL FINANCES

FINAL OF A FOUR-PART SERIES

When the Canadian economy bit the dust in mid-1990, no one could have forecast how long nor how deep this "economic downturn" would last.

When politicians and economists finally admitted, and perhaps submitted, to the "R" word, things went from bad to worse.

Today, however, these same forecasters are using the "R" word to signify recovery and while many taxpayers wait for that recovery to trickle down, it seems to be the perfect time to address the health of personal finances.

Mired in recession for close to four years, personal finances have taken a beating and now, perhaps more than ever, it is important to talk to financial advisors, investors and tax specialists to ensure maximum results.

The CJN has enlisted the services of four professionals who hail from the world of finance to assess the finances of several families that represent a cross-section of the public.

This is the last of a four-part series. The people featured in the articles are real but their names have been changed to protect their identities.

As well, the advice given pertains only to the individuals addressed in this letter and readers are cautioned to obtain specific professional advice prior to the implementation of any of these suggestions.

By JACK POLLACK AND GORDON BERGER
Special to The CJN

Dear Gloria:

Thank you for taking the time from your busy schedule to meet with us. It was a great pleasure. Based upon the information provided to us at the meeting, here are our recommendations for your consideration.

Generally speaking we have no "quick fixes" for our clients. We implement a three-step process: meet our clients and develop a preliminary report; at a second meeting review the report with the client and attempt to reach some decisions as well as solidify their needs; and lastly, compile our final report.

Your annual balance sheet of income vs. expenses is as follows:

Income	$43,732 (26 times $1,682)
	$ 7,200 (Rental Income)
	Total $50,932

Automatic Debits from paycheque (Expense)

1.	Income Tax (26 x 366)	$ 9,516.00
2.	Canada Pension (26 x 38.15)	991.90
3.	U.I.C. (26 x 47.89)	1,245.14
4.	Pension Plan (26 x 100)	1,200.00
5.	Union Dues (26 x 15)	180.00
6.	Credit Union (26 x 150)	1,800.00
7.	SCR (26 x 84.11)	2,186.86
	Subtotal	$17,119.90
8.	Realty Tax (12 x 300)	3,600
9.	Hydro (12 x 250)	3,000
10.	Gas (12 x 100)	1,200
11.	Car Insurance (12 x 100)	1,200
12.	Home Insurance (12 x 21)	252
13.	Daycare (12 x 500)	6,000
14.	Auto Gas (12 x 100)	1,200
15.	Food (12 x 350)	4,200
16.	Cable (12 x 50)	600
17.	Telephone (12 x 100)	1,200
18.	Cleaning (12 x 150)	1,800
19.	Gardening (12 x 50)	600
	Subtotal	$24,852
	Total	$41,971.90
	Misc.	$ 8,960.10

You are currently a single mother, and your two-year-old son is in daycare. Your assets include: RRSP savings of $3,000, $2,000 in the bank and a debt-free home with a value of $350,000. To the best of our knowledge you have no other assets or outstanding loans.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Estate Planning

Currently you have a "hand shake" informal agreement with your son's father as to what happens to his assets should he pass on, and what happens to your son should you pass on. This particular matter is of utmost importance for many reasons. In order for your son to be taken care of immediately, in case of your being involved in an accident, a will is of prime importance.

In addition, as you are currently the only legal guardian of your son and there have been changes in the law, you should consider an enduring power of attorney letter so that if you become incapacitated your son will be taken care of financially as well as emotionally by someone whom you choose.

As we understand your personal situation with your son's father, it is always prudent to commit these obligations in the form of a legal, written will. As such, our first and most important recommendation is to see a lawyer and have this matter addressed immediately.

2. Life Insurance

Following the estate planning issues, it is of extreme importance that your son have the funds necessary to secure his future held in a trust for him should you pass on prematurely. You presently have $5,000 of group life insurance through your company's benefit plan. Although you have a verbal arrangement with your son's father, you indicated that his cash flow is not enough to support the additional expenses of a dependant.

We have estimated that approximately $600,000 of capital should generate enough money in order for your son continue with the program you had planned for him. This program includes daycare, followed by (preferably) private school and then a university/college education. This capital need may be funded by purchasing a life insurance policy.

Term insurance provides a death benefit for a set term premium of one year up to 20 years. At the end of the term the premium is increased for the next term period. This type of insurance is generally cost effective for short-term goals, i.e. 15 years or less. For long-term requirements, such as income replacement, different products may be more appropriate.

Term to 100 insurance provides is a contract term to age 100. The premium is payable to age 100. This type of policy can have a level, guaranteed death benefit and premium.

Whole Life policies are a derivative of simple term policies. They provide for insurance combined with investment. These investments are tax sheltered, but whole life provides little if any accountability as to the cost of insurance, administrative expenses, death benefits and or future cash values. Although these types of policies have proven beneficial in the past, in today's economic environments more accountable policies are required such as Universal Life.

Universal Life is a combination of term insurance and investment. A well-structured Universal Life product guarantees term to 100 rates of insurance with accountable, tax sheltered investment funds. Universal Life guarantees the client insurance costs (as described in the contract), minimum returns and accountability on future cash values. The diversification may be anywhere from interest-sensitive investments to mutual funds, and since returns are tax sheltered, this can prove to be extremely advantageous.

3. Tax Planning

Given that the government is our partner in life (the partnership ranges between 29.3 per cent to 53.2 per cent), it is important we keep our partnership honest. That is to say, individuals should pay as much tax as the Income Tax Act requires, but not more. We work with tax specialists to ensure our clients are provided with up-to-date solutions for their own specific situations.

Since you purchased your home within the last year and given your status as a single mother, we had an inclination that your taxes may be higher than they should be. On a no-name basis we forwarded your circumstances to one of our specialists for review. He estimated that you may have a tax savings available of approximately $1,600 to $8,000 this year, and possibly in subsequent years as well. Should these figures become true your cash flow may increase significantly. In order to facilitate and/or clarify how these savings can be achieved you should get tax advice as soon as possible.

4. Retirement Planning

Before adjustments are made, we recommend you consider a Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP) to meet your goal of retiring as soon of possible. You currently have $3,000 in an RRSP.

Retirement planning is necessary. As your current expenses after income tax are approximately $33,000, we can estimate that at age 65 these expenses may rise $75,200 (using 4 per cent inflation factor). Generally speaking retirement expenditures are approximately 75 per cent of pre-retirement income, so your retirement needs are reduced to $56,400.

With Old Age Security and Canada Pension Plans providing a portion of your living expenses, the rest will need to be funded by you. There is an RRSP carry forward provision which may enable you to contribute a large amount this year and at the same time reduce your taxable income. We would like to work with you to develop an investment plan to provide retirement income.

5. Disability Insurance

You said you are currently covered by your company's disability program. This plan may suit your needs adequately, but we need to review the douments, which you are obtaining for us.

6. Education Savings Plans

One of the important issues you raised was that of creating a savings account for your son's future education plans. There are a number of different options available. These types of investments range from Registered Education Savings Plans (RESP) to Mutual Fund Investments and or Tax Sheltered Life Insurance plans.

The RESP are primarily interest driven. Funds are invested in Canada Bonds and government backed mortgages, and other interest sensitive investments. This type of plan can be advantageous as the growth within the plan is tax sheltered, and is paid to the child directly during his/her post-secondary education.

The disadvantages of these plans are that they are solely dependant on your child attending a credited university or college. In addition the investors do not know what the actual payout will be until the child has made his/her request for the funds.

A mutual fund approach to investment has a number of advantages. First of all, unlike the RESPs, the growth is accountable each and every year, and the investment is controlled by the depositor and can be used for any purpose deemed appropriate by the depositor and at any time. In addition, a well-balanced portfolio can achieve higher returns than the RESP. The disadvantages may be poor investment advice and returns, as well as the tax implications which may develop.

Tax Sheltered Life Insurance Plans have a number of benefits which combine the RESP and mutual fund strategies. First and most importantly there is a life insuance component. Depending on the structure of the policy the insurance face amount may be substantial. Given today's health issues, it may be good to provide life insurance for your child while at the same time providing a tax sheltered plan for your child's education. Using an extremely accountable, well-structured life insurance product will allow you to meet your education funding goals while maintaining control of the policy.

In closing we feel that in your situation a number of improvements may be achieved by hard work, diligence, and a devotion to a carefully constructed strategic plan.

We look forward to our next meeting.

Yours truly,

Gordon Berger Jack Pollack

Single mother welcomes financial, estate advice

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

In order to determine Gloria's assessment of their financial planning experience, The CJN conducted a follow-up interview with her.

TORONTO — Gloria said she was eager to be involved in the series because, as a single mother, she was aware of the importance of providing financial security for her child's future.

"From a reality point of view, it gave me a good overview of my current situation," she said.

As far as Jack's and Gordon's recommendations are concerned, Gloria said she is currently looking into obtaining a lawyer to draw up a Will. As well, PanFinancial may well be her choice to investigate a life insurance policy, she said.

"I had been looking but, so far, I hadn't found anything satisfactory. I'm willing to pursue them," Gloria said, adding that she found the interview session with Jack and Gordon comfortable and personable.

Gloria said the planning session exposed her to the financial marketplace. "The experience has shown me how to manage with what I have — to be more effective.

Gloria added that she would try to implement Jack's and Gordon's advice but that she would need to be guided to ensure her finances remain on track.

"It was a good personal experience."

Businessman to improve Israel's economic image

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Bureaucrats and political appointees: take a back seat. Leave this job to a businessman.

That was what the government did a year ago when it tapped Gadot Petrochemical Industries' Giora Meyuhas to run its Economic Mission for North America.

He is the first CEO of a major firm to fill the New York post, and his work promises to bear fruit.

"Our old image, of a very bureaucratic country, plagued by excessive government involvement in the business sector and political instability, is no longer true, but it still lingers in the minds of American business leaders," Meyuhas says.

"We've gone through great improvements recently, especially with increased privatization. My job is to bring that to the attention of the business community."

Beside improving the country's image as a good place to do business, Meyuhas says the mission aims to enhance trade and create joint ventures between Israel and North America.

The mission was created by combining the North American offices of the Israeli Finance Ministry and the Ministry of Industry and Trade.

The unification has enabled Meyuhas since August to streamline and coordinate operations at the six North American branches under his control.

The appointment of a businessman to head the mission signaled a new focus for government economic activity abroad. It also adds a corporate flavor to what has essentially been a political position.

Meyuhas' business credentials are top-notch. Under his leadership, Gadot sales grew from $65 million to $100 million annually. He was awarded the 1993 Israel Industry Prize for his managerial skills and his leadership role in the chemicals industry.

Just as relevant is the fact that his political and business philosophies are in line with current government policies.

"A true dove," as he describes himself, Meyuhas has for years been promoting the "invest, don't give charity" approach now so popular in Zionist circles.

"In my opinion, the Zionism of today is economic development," he says.

Five years ago, he brokered a revolutionary partnership between Haifa Municipality and the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Boston, by which the philanthropies earmark more than $2 million of their $15-million annual Operation Exodus campaign to fund four development projects in Haifa.

The Haifa-Boston partnership has since become a model for other North American Jewish communities in a process of "economic twinning" that Meyuhas believes should be encouraged.

One of Meyuhas's priorities is to more aggressively court multinational companies, which he believes could be tempted to establish research-and-development centers in Israel that might blossom into subsidiary branches.

Many of these companies have traditionally avoided Israeli involvement because of regional instability, the Arab boycott, and the feeling that the Israeli market is too small.

Giora Meyuhas

The peace process will, Meyuhas tells prospective investors, bring political stability to the region "sooner than we think." The Arab boycott is no longer a serious deterrent, he believes.

"The companies see Israel in Oman, Qatar and Tunisia, they see Rabin in Jordan, they see Japanese companies falling over each other to come to Israel," he points out.

And the economic cooperation that may result from the multilateral negotiations will create a market not of Israel's five million, but of the region's 200 million consumers.

Part of enhancing Israel's image as a good place to do business is improving the country's longstanding reputation for abrupt or lackadaisical service. Since Meyuhas's appointment, the economic mission has hired a high-powered New York firm, Edelman's Public Relations. Brochures highlight what Meyuhas believes is the country's major asset: a highly skilled, intelligent, dependable workforce.

Multinational companies impressed

He believes this factor is more of an inducement to foreign companies than any government incentives or free trade agreements.

Service is the byword in all dealings with foreign companies, Meyuhas emphasizes. It's not enough to rely on native Israeli chutzpah.

"We are creating a service-oriented mission, so when an American company interested in doing business in Israel approaches us for information, it will receive the best service possible," he says.

Under his stewardship, the North American Economic Mission has aggressively organized visiting delegations of multinational companies interested in exploring the Israeli option. This, he stresses, is the mission's "target audience."

Three months ago, the top management of General Motors took a look at several proposed investment sites. In June, a delegation representing heavy-hitters from several organizations — including the KKR financial advisory firm, Salomon Bros., and Washington attorney Vernon Jordan — toured the country on a trip organized by Wall Street consultant Jim Wolfensohn.

The chairman of Westinghouse visited the following week; Baxter International was nosing around in mid-July; American Home Products has scheduled visit in the very near future; and Pfizer pharmaceuticals may send a delegation in October.

Cargil, a Minnesota-based agricultural trading company, is involved in several R&D projects in Israel and is considering establishing its own R&D centre.

Although Israel is a traditional favorite for high-tech industries looking for foreign investment, Meyuhas is actively trying to encourage a wider diversity of business investment, particularly in the food and agricultural fields.

He points out that the Arab countries import more than $20 billion a year in food products, between 60 and 80 percent of their total consumption.

With the advent of a regional Middle Eastern economic entity, Meyuhas believes this will present foreign companies with a huge, virtually untapped consumer market.

"All of them are checking it out. They're waiting to see what will develop politically, but they already see the potential."

Meyuhas says from September through early spring, calls to his offices from interested American companies had doubled.

"Since Hebron, interest has stabilized somewhat, but it's still there. Even though it was the action of one lunatic, it had an effect that cannot be denied. But the overall process of moving forward is irreversible, and is continuing to develop more rapidly than we all anticipated."

Early this year, Meyuhas was asked to be the economic liaison for Builders for Peace, a consortium of American Jewish and Arab business leaders seeking to invest in joint ventures in Israel and in the territories.

As a government representative, Meyuhas is constrained from actually working with foreign companies that wish to invest in territories that will fall within the Palestinian autonomous zones.

"In a way, we encourage it, because it's in our interest that these regions develop economically," he says. "But we cannot be formally involved. This must be done by the Palestinian National Authority."

How does this former CEO enjoy his first foray into the government sector? Well, he says with a smile, he won't make a career out of it.

"I was ready to contribute what I could, because this is a real personal mission for me, but I'll probably return to my business when I finish here [in 1995]," he says. But the practice of government encouraging business leaders to enter public service temporarily and add their expertise is one that should be encouraged, he says.

"If businessmen and women would be willing to serve abroad for a year or two or three, it would be a very important thing for the country," he says. "This is done much more in the US, where the president calls upon business leaders for their expertise. We should do more of it, too."

Peace benefits to flow like water

By ELMER WINTER
Special to The CJN

MILWAUKEE — Significant economic benefits will flow to Israel and Jordan following the signing of the Washington Declaration by King Hussein and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

High on the agenda of items to be discussed by the two countries are the promotion of tourism in the Dead Sea region, development plans for the Jordan Rift Valley and the possible building of a canal from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea.

The Red-Dead canal would generate electricity to light homes and desalinate water. Israel and Jordan will also begin joint seismic exploration of the Dead Sea's oil potential.

Jordan particularly stands to benefit from peace with Israel. Israeli technology, particularly in the area of agriculture, can be a tremendous boon to Jordanian farmers.

But Israel will benefit as well. If the Jordanians receive loans and grants from foreign countries — like those promised to the Palestinians — they can buy Israeli materials to develop their infrastructure, particularly in the areas of electric power and telecommunications. Israeli companies will also derive benefits from supplying the Jordanians with factory-built housing, power stations and water purification systems.

Joint manufacturing ventures are likely to be established between Israeli and Jordanian companies in such fields as textiles, food, pharmaceuticals, electronics and computers.

Joint free-export processing zones may be established to attract companies. Moreover, Israel's free trade agreements with the United States and the European Economic Community could be utilized by Jordanian companies operating joint ventures with Iraeli firms.

Jordan is plagued by high unemployment. Jobs are needed now — jobs that can best be created by foreign investors.

If the Jordanians wish to attract American companies to open factories in their country, they would be well advised to show leadership in getting their fellow Arabs to do what they themselves have done -- eliminate the economic boycott of Israel.

Partnerships between American, Jordanian and Israeli firms would allow the Israeli component to provide R&D capability, technical know-how and Western-style management. The Jordanians would provide the labor force, and the American company would provide marketing skills vital to sales in the American and European markets.

How soon will joint Israeli-Jordanian projects be set in motion? The Jordanian government will not make deals until the final border with Israel is resolved.

There has been considerable discussion over the years about a Mideast Common Market. The accord between Jordan and Israel is one giant step towards its realization.

Elmer Winter is chair of the Committee for Economic Growth in Israel.

This week The CJN features . . . Sheppard Celebrity Travel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

TORONTO — Renata Eisen, co-owner of Sheppard Celebrity Travel at Finch and Bathurst, has been working in the travel industry since 1952.

She told The CJN she still finds the travel business exciting. "It's so varied even after 43 years. Every single day I'm doing something I haven't done before."

She said the travel industry has changed a lot since the '50s: travel was expensive and not readily affordable for the general population. There were no packaged tours or charters then, she said. Overseas trips were customized with travel agents taking care of all the details from booking flights and hotels to arranging transportation from the airports.

Charters and package trips revolutionized the travel industry when they were introduced 22 years ago, Eisen said.

While package tours have made travel more affordable, sightseeing became expendable, she said. "Its easier to plunk a person on a beach and pick them up one week later."

She illustrated this point by explaining the impact of packaged tours on travel to Mexico. Most tourists to that country used to visit the museums of Mexico City before heading to a beach destination for a few days in the sun, she said. But now most tourists skip them and head directly to a beach.

"The one week holiday was born with the package," she said, because a week of beach relaxation, particularly in the Caribbean is enough time.

While Sheppard Celebrity Travel is an all purpose agency — it covers the gamut of travel for all age groups from business flights and weekend getaways to group tours, cruises and package vacations, Eisen has developed her own niche.

She's a specialist in customized travel, drawing on her years of training, to plan trips for those people who don't like group and package tours. Eisen said she also developed an expertise in health and fitness travel because there was a big demand from her clients for these kinds of vacations.

Recently she planned a walking trip in Scotland for a mother and daughter. But bicycle tours are more common, with a number of companies offering tours with varying degrees of difficulty and cost, Eisen said.

For example, one tour company has an eight-day trip through Vermont priced at $900 (U.S.), while another has a two-week trip through China for $5,500, and neither price includes transportation costs, she said.

The cost of spa vacations also vary. Well-known spas such as the Canyon Ranch in Arizona and the Golden Door in California are pricey, at $3,000 (U.S.) a week, she said. But there are also many mid-priced spas for $1,500 (U.S.) a week, as well as some very nice places in Mexico at $500 (U.S.) a week, she said.

Eisen explained that North American style spas cater to physical fitness and weight loss while European health spas offer treatments like mud baths and hot springs for chronic conditions like arthritis. The spas in Hungary and Italy are affordable for North Americans, she said. Hungarian spas are in the $500 a week range, while Italian ones cost about $120 (U.S.) a day.

Eisen recommended American-style spas for people travelling alone because the atmosphere is conducive to meeting people. She said cruises, all-inclusive resorts like Club Med and group tours can also provide single travellers with some companionship.

Florida offers families affordable vacations in both winter and summer, although prices peak at Christmas and during March break, Eisen said. She suggested that budget-conscious families heading to Disney World stay in hotels outside of the theme park to save money.

Resort holidays are good family vacations in the summer, but the success of a holiday is too dependent on the weather at resorts in Ontario, Eisen said. She prefers the resorts in the Catskills which have many more in-door activities including swimming and tennis.

BIZ BRIEFS

CPI Jumps 1.1 %

JERUSALEM — Inflation pushed ahead in July, as the Consumer Price Index jumped 1.1 per cent on a continued increase in housing prices.

Rahamim Ozama, head of the Central Bureau of Statistics' price division, estimated that inflation is running at 14.5 per cent annually.

Housing prices have continued their upward course, despite the government's attempts at curbing them. During May and June housing prices rose 3.2 per cent, while in the previous two months, they went up 2.1 per cent.

Apartment prices rose 2.6 per cent last month, pushing overall housing prices up 2.1 per cent. Since July 1993, housing prices have shot up 27.8 per cent.

Reacting to July's high index, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said the government may have to consider going back to public sector building to arrest climbing inflation.

Finance Minister Avraham Shohat reiterated that despite the continued rise in inflation, there is no need to devalue the shekel.

Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel said "the index is undoubtedly high and we will need to study its consequences on the economy." Most economists predict the central bank will raise interest rates next month to curb inflation.

The Producer Price Index also is rising at a higher rate of 7.8 per cent, while only a few months ago it was increasing at an annual rate of 6.8 per cent.

July's rise brought the index to 113.1 points on a baseline averaging 100 in 1993, compared with 111.9 points in June.

Job Seekers Drop

JERUSALEM — Nearly 107,000 jobseekers applied at the country's regular and academic labor exchanges last month, which after seasonal adjustment reflects a drop of about 1.4 per cent in the number of those looking for work.

Jobseekers with academic degrees rose slightly last month to 14,600; up 1.2 per cent from June.

July saw a deepening of existing unemployment, however. The proportion of jobseekers who had been out of work for six days or more rose to 74 per cent compared to 72.3 per cent in June; or 68,800 compared to 63,800.

The number of new immigrants seeking jobs rose by 1.8 per cent last month (11,000 compared to 10,800).

Women constituted 56.7 per cent of jobseekers last month, compared to 56 per cent in June.

The Employment Service found jobs for 38,900 applicants last month, compared to 17,500 in June.

Deal Signed With Firms

JERUSALEM — Africa Israel, Bank Leumi's real estate, tourism and insurance subsidiary, has signed a memorandum of understanding with a consortium of Jordanian and Palestinian companies.

Jordanian businessman Dawud Qutub, head of investment group Triangle International, said the group was "trying to make the peace machine active" through operation of this "golden-triangle."

The new company, to be registered in another country, will initially deal with the development of tourism projects in Jordan and the Palestinian autonomous areas.

The group is already examining possible hotel and tourist centers in Akaba, Petra, the northern Dead Sea area and other locations in Jordan.

Chairmanship of the venture will be a bi-annual rotation between the Israeli and Jordanian-Palestinian representatives, with the first chairman being from Africa Israel.

The group intends to expand activity into other areas, particularly real estate, with construction of office and industrial parks a possibility.

Contact between the Africa Israel and the Jordanian-Palestinian group was initiated a year ago.

Pioneer UAV Wins $20 M Contract

JERUSALEM — Pioneer UAV Inc., a joint venture between Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) and AAI Corporation of the United States, has been awarded a $20.2 million firm fixed price contract by the U.S. Department of Defence.

The contract is for 20 Pioneer Unmanned Air Vehicles with payloads, nine fuselages and applicable data which will support the Pioneer UAV units of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps by replacing air vehicles lost during operations and training. The Pioneer is the only UAV system in its class in ths US inventory and operates on land and on board ships.

Fifty-two percent of the work will be carried out in Israel.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

A Talent For Genius: The Life & Times of Oscar Levant by Sam Kashner & Nancy Schoenberger (Random House of Canada, $32.50).

In his heyday — the tumultuous '30s — Oscar Levant (1905-1972) was a famous personality. His brilliance and talent were widely recognized and admired.

He was ranked among the world's top concert pianists, made hundreds of classical recordings, scintillated as a member of the Information Please quiz team, acted in 13 Hollywood movies and wrote three best selling books.

The entertainment community always held its breath whenever Levant opened his mouth. What witty or acerbic comment would emerge? What outrageous witticism or wisecrack would come forth? Asked what he wanted to be as a kid, he answered, "An orphan."

Levant was born in 1906 to an immigrant Orthodox family in Pittsburgh. His Jewish background provided him with a love of music coupled with the status of an outsider. "That status gave him the boldness, the chutzpah, and the irony to attack the cultural mainstream; it also provided him with a lifelong sense of inadequacy and resentment against the status quo."

Attended Hebrew school

As a youngster he faithfully attended Hebrew school and responded positively to Jewish ritual. "He was fascinated by Kaddish, the Jewish prayer for the dead, a fascination that would take another form in adulthood: a phobic dread of any mention or thought of death. When, at the suggestion of his psychiatrist, he finally gave up the ritual of reciting Kaddish, he felt he was betraying not God but his mother, at whose knee he had first learned to observe all the Jewish rituals."

Leaving school as a teenager, the eager and gifted Levant quickly found work as a pianist in restaurants and nightclubs. Before long he was rubbing shoulders with the great and near great of Broadway. Walter Winchell, the gossip columnist, was quick to recount his wicked quips to a large and appreciative audience. Levant, fascinated by George Gershwin with whom he had a strange love-hate relationship, became the premier interpreter of his music. He said of Porgy and Bess that it was a right step in the wrong direction.

Levant's great problem was that his multi-talented personality never became focused. He was beset by conflicting goals and constantly shifting interests.

Addicted to variety of drugs

Moreover in his middle years he began to suffer severe mental and emotional deterioration. He fell victim to a series of obsessions and phobias. Addicted to a variety of drugs, four packs of cigarettes a day and over twenty cups of coffee, he became increasingly doubtful about his abilities and revelled in self-depreciating humor.

Once on a TV show he was asked where he lived. He answered, "On the periphery." He also confided to his audience that there was a fine line between genius and insanity and that he had erased that line.

In search of relief from his bouts of manic depressive illness, he went through a number of well known psychiatrists, and was hospitalized on five occasions.

"In an era when every television talk show casually offers up the confessions of reformed substance abusers, it is hard to realize how shocking that information was in the mid-1950s, when Levant went on the Jack Paar Tonight Show and talked candidly about the shock treatments, drug withdrawal, and group therapy he had undergone."

This, the first-full length biography of Levant, brings to life a fascinating personality, as well as numerous figures from a star-studded era: Fred Astaire, Judy Garland, Elizabeth Taylor, Lauren Bacall, Charlie Chaplin, Dorothy Parker, Arturo Toscanini, Candice Bergen, Joan Collins, Vincente Minneli, Harpo Marx and Gene Kelly.

I once heard Levant play at New York's Lewisohn Stadium almost a half century ago. It was a memorable evening. He deserves to be remembered — America's favorite enfant terrible.

Alexi Fateyeu, Andrei Vinogradov and Dimitry Frid perform.

Russian artists a hit in revue

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Russian Jewish dancers, singers and musicians stranded in Toronto when Russians on Broadway went belly up, scored their own triumph at Skylight Theatre in Earl Bales Park recently at the annual Yiddish concert produced by Nathan Garnick and Richard Bassett.

Alexei Fateyev with the Kalinka Dancers, singer-pianist Nina Shapilsky and tenor Igor Portnoi were such hits at the afternoon and evening performances that they were called back to the stage time and again for encores. This concert should have been billed Russians on North Bathurst Street, so pervading were the haunting Russian airs and the spirited leaps of the Kalinka Dancers.

Every good show leaves you wanting more and in this case it was to capture more of that incredible dancer Fateyev. When performing with the others in three dances, Fateyev kept his artistry in rein, as suited the ensemble spirit. But the audience of 1,200 got a glimpse of the real Fateyev when in the final seconds of Otchi Chornia he literally flew across the stage in a blur.

Those dancing with him were Natasha Ocheredco, Volody Guodacov, Evalina Gamina, Andrei Vinogradov, Elena Fried, Dimitri Fried and Natusha Travinski.

Michael Ziskind on violin, Igor Ziskind on flute and Eduard Kagasnky on accordian were the Musical Legend Ensemble which opened the concert.

If the Russians served the appetizer and dessert, the entree came in the form of the solid performances in Yiddish of Nathan Garnick, the master story teller, and Gloria Valentine, who sang up a storm of audience participation with Yossel Ber, Shvigaro and Rumania, Rumania, suitably attired for each, including the role of Gittel the Matchmaker.

Sporting a mortar board and an academic gown, Garnick, as his alter ego Naphtoli Gimel, gave a Yiddish lesson, a case of art imitating life since Garnick is a Yiddish teacher in real life. All his painful and pleasurable experiences with students over the years were compressed into his act, a piece of theatre as inspired as the Broadway play The English Lesson by Israel Horowitz.

It is Garnick's sense of timing and an instinctive knowledge of when to turn to the audience for help which make him the actor he is. Sidekick Richard Bassett is developing well as his foil.

When in English you want comparative forms, Garnick lectured, you say high, higher and highest. In Yiddish you say hoich, hoicher and a 'lunger lux' (flagpole). Paul Mathews was his accompanist.

Thanks were extended to Anne Mirvish and Herb Stein for their patronage of the Russian troupe. Mary Goldlust was artistic coordinator and Marvin Schiff did the artwork.

Carousel still great after 50 years

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

A scene from Rodgers and Hammerstein's Carousel.

NEW YORK — Lincoln Centre's imported Carousel (from Britain's National Theatre) is a cinch to find long-term residency on Vivian Beaumont's revolving stage.

Equally ecstatic reception would await this beautiful production if it were moved to Toronto or, for that matter, to Peoria, Illinois, because this is about as good as a revival can get.

Everyone must know by this time that Carousel is one of America's great musicals, and believe it or not, it has been 50 years since it first played on Broadway. How can you help but fall under the spell of its glorious score, which includes such perennial favorites as If I Loved You; What's The Use Of Wond'rin'?; You'll Never Walk Alone; Mr. Snow and the ebullient June Is Bustin' Out All Over? Of the nine shows Richard Rodgers did with Oscar Hammerstein II (They were the pre-eminent Jewish composer-lyricist team of their generation.), Carousel remained their personal favorite. It is based on Ferenc Molnar's original fantasy Liliom.

Carousel is a tragic tale of a confused and troubled carnival barker, Billy Bigelow, and his abusive relationship with a dreamy mill girl, Julie Jordan, who capitulates to whirlwind seduction on a moonlit New England night, back in the 1870s. The relationship builds through a turbulent marriage, although the birth of a daughter adds equilibrium and poignancy to the story line.

Director Nicholas Hytner has underscored the musical's dark side, brilliantly assisted by the sensuous choreography of Kenneth McMillan, and the superb expressionistic settings of designer Bob Crowley. This triumverate are the real stars of the show, mounting a dazzling 1990s stylized staging that is most radical and refreshing.

The leads are for the most part excellent, except for Michael Hayden's (Billy Bigelow) voice, which is not powerful enough, especially for the famous and demanding Soliloquy. Sally Murphy is deeply moving as Julie Jordan. Black actress-singer Shirley Verrett plays Julie's cousin and is strong in her treatment of You'll Never Walk Alone. The heroine's best pal Carrie is finely portrayed by Audre Ann McDonald (a real find!) who is courted and won by Mr. Snow (Eddie Korbich); both display lustrous voices.

If you're heading into Big Town to see a show or two, this one should go to the top of your list, but be prepared to choke back a tear or two. Take it from me, the story is utterly believable and heart-breakingly genuine.

Appearing for an unlimited run at Lincoln Centre Theatre, 150 West 65th St.

For tickets call Tele-Charge (212) 239-6200.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Authors Festival: Billed as "the greatest retale operation in the world," this year's International Festival of Authors takes place at Toronto's Harbourfront, Oct. 12-22. More than 100 of the world's finest authors are expected to participate. Three prestigious literary prizes, worth approximately $74,000 in total, are set to be given out during an awards ceremony, and a special salute is planned to honour Canadian novelist and screenwriter Brian Moore.

E.L. Doctorow, Grace Paley, Mordecai Richler and Nathan Shaham (of Israel) are some of the participating writers of special interest to the Jewish community. Another is biographer Stanley Weintraub, who is scheduled to discuss the literary contributions of 19th-century British politician-author Benjamin Disraeli.

When faced with an embarrassment of literary riches of this sort, it would seem depressingly provincial for Eye On Arts to restrict itself to mentioning only Jewish authors or only writers that explore Judaic themes. Julian Barnes, Nadine Gordimer, Katherine Govier, W.P. Kinsella, Ursula K. Le Guin, Alison Lurie and Joyce Carol Oates are among many other literary luminaries on the roster.

Evening readings are $16. Harbourfront Centre Box Office, (416) 973-4000.

North York Poet Receives Literary Doctorate: Congratulations to Donia Blumenfeld Clenman, who leaves this week for Taipei, Taiwan, to attend the 15th World Congress of Arts and Culture, which is conferring upon her a Litt.D — an honorary literary degree. A Polish-born Holocaust survivor, Clenman has written many books of poetry and books for children, including I Dream In English Too, the work for which she is perhaps best known. Last year she came in second for the Israeli Poetry Peace Prize. She adopted the name Blumenfeld, her mother's maiden name, in commemoration of family members lost in the Holocaust.

Toronto Artist Wins More Recognition: Leon Zernitsky, a Belarus-born artist who came to Canada four years ago, received news last week that he has won two awards from the graphics magazine, Applied Arts. The magazine ran an international competition for illustrations in numerous categories and Zernitsky, who draws illustrations for business magazines, won in the categories of self-promotion and finest unpublished illustration. As a prize, his name is published in a special edition of the magazine which goes out to art buyers.

New Parchment Released: The third annual issue of Parchment, Canada's national anthology of Jewish writing, recently appeared. It features 124 pages of the fiction and poetry of Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, Robyn Sarah, Simcha Simchovitch, J.J. Steinfeld and other writers. Available for $12 ($20 for two years) from Parchment, 445 Hamilton Road, London, Ont., N5Z 1S2. Subscribers include Saul Bellow, Irving Layton, Elie Wiesel and Cynthia Ozick.

Sale & Open House at Leah Posluns: The Leah Posluns Theatre and the North JCC offer theatre lovers a bird's eye view of backstage life with guided theatre tours and plenty of other theatre-oriented events, Sunday Sept. 18, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Here is a solid day of good family fun. Activities include creative drama workshops, roaming clowns, thespian performers, a petting zoo and face-painting.

As well, a farmers market is planned, offering corn, apples, tomatoes, baked goods and more. A planned Street Sale will offer hand-crafted items, clothing, specialty foods, jewellery. All proceeds go directly to Leah Posluns Theatre's special projects. Admission is free.

At the Koffler Gallery: Two interesting projects are coming to this gallery at 4588 Bathurst St., Willowdale. The Quilt Project involves the efforts of more than 100 female artists from across Canada, and makes reference to the history of quilting as a "subversive" activity and a means by which women have documented their lives and histories. It is presented in collaboration with the Women's Art Resource Centre of Toronto. The Succah Project is a three-dimensional structure designed by Toronto architects Guela Solow and Susan Spiegel.
